

THE WORKS OF
THÉOPHILE GAUTIER

IN TWENTY-FOUR VOLUMES

LIMITED TO ONE THOUSAND REGISTERED SETS, OF WHICH
THIS IS NUMBER 297

THE WORKS OF
THÉOPHILE GAUTIER

VOLUME SEVENTEEN

TRANSLATED AND EDITED BY
PROFESSOR F. C. DE SUMICHRIST

Department of French, Harvard University

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

PART ONE

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY THE EDITOR

"God be with your lordship," said Peter, bending over the hand the baron held out to him.— Page 112.

THE JENSON SOCIETY

PRINTED FOR MEMBERS ONLY

MCMV

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2010

“God be with your lordship,” said Prier, bending over the board the baron held out to him.—Page 112.

THE WORKS OF
THÉOPHILE GAUTIER

VOLUME SEVENTEEN

TRANSLATED AND EDITED BY
PROFESSOR F. C. DE SUMICHRAST

Department of French, Harvard University

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

PART ONE

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY THE EDITOR

THE JENSON SOCIETY

PRINTED FOR MEMBERS ONLY

MCMV

Copyright, 1902, by GEORGE D. SPROUL

UNIVERSITY PRESS • JOHN WILSON AND SON • CAMBRIDGE, U. S. A.

Contents

INTRODUCTION	Page	3
<hr/>
I POVERTY HALL	“	21
II THE CAR OF THESPIA	“	57
III THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN	“	117
IV SCARECROW HIGHWAYMEN	“	146
V AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE	“	175
VI A SNOW EFFECT	“	264
VII WHICH JUSTIFIES THE TITLE OF THIS NOVEL	“	306

List of Illustrations

“God be with your lordship,” said Peter, bending over the hand the Baron held out to him	Frontispiece
This one was Mataserpies, the valiant Spaniard	Page 154

Introduction

*C A P T A I N
F R A C A S S E*

Introduction

IT is perhaps too much to say, as does Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, in his admirable "History of the Works of Théophile Gautier," that this novel engrossed the author during his whole life, but it certainly did spread itself over a considerable number of his years of literary labour. He conceived the notion of writing it immediately after "Mademoiselle de Maupin" appeared in print, and, in the opinion of the above quoted critic, the hero is intended as a pendant to the heroine of that most famous and most brilliant story. Here again it is difficult to agree with the learned bibliophile, for there is no very apparent resemblance between the amazingly bold and daringly experimentative maiden and the dullish owner of and resident in Poverty Hall.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Gautier was an adept at promise making, and at promise evading also. Rather, — to be fair to him, — he often hoped to carry out projects that attracted him, and rashly allowed himself to indulge in the pleasure of the announcement of a forthcoming tale, novel, essay on painting, or book of travels. Then other and more imperious calls upon his time and his fertile pen interfered, and the publication was delayed and delayed until publishers and readers alike ceased to hope for the gratification of their tastes. Of all his yet-to-be-written books none, probably, was so long advertised as “Captain Fracasse;” for Eugène Renduel, the publisher of “Mademoiselle de Maupin” and of “Les Jeunes-France,” included it in his catalogues as far back as 1836. Two years later, and in 1839, it was again announced as “forthcoming,” but it did not turn up for all that, and the public were kept wondering what manner of tale it might be that took so long to elaborate.

In point of fact, there seems to have been no single line of the novel written at that time, nor, indeed, for several years later. The Presse, to which Gautier had become a contributor, had every reason to believe that it would pull off the prize for accurate prophecy, and it joyously informed its readers that the long looked-for work would appear in the Revue des Deux Mondes, with which Gautier was then on good terms; and that staid periodical itself made a similar proclamation in March, 1846, two months after the prophecy in the Presse. But a cloud no bigger than a man's hand came up on the horizon, and ere long Gautier and the Revue des Deux Mondes had quarrelled, thus entailing another postponement of the mysterious tale.

INTRODUCTION

This was all to the author's advantage, for no word of the story was yet down on paper, though no doubt much of the novel existed in his mind, and it needed only a definite contract, binding him hard and fast to complete the work in a given time, to induce him to put it into definite and tangible form.

Two other periodicals were added to the collection of hopefuls: the Revue de Paris and the Librairie Nouvelle, the former announcing it for many months, from October 1853 to March 1856, and the latter also some time between these dates. But neither of these was destined to present "Captain Fracasse" to the expectant public, that piece of good fortune falling to the Revue Nationale et Étrangère, founded and managed by Charpentier.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Gautier had written the first chapter of the book, "Poverty Hall," some time in 1854 or 1855, and had handed the copy to the Revue de Paris, in fulfilment of his pledge to that periodical, and it had been printed in expectation of the remaining portions coming along. But the Revue de Paris was suppressed, and then an agreement was made between the publishers and Gautier and Charpentier, under the terms of which the novel was transferred to the Revue Nationale et Étrangère, in which, in the issue of December 25, 1861, "Captain Fracasse" at last made his bow to the public and never left the stage until eighteen months later, when the final chapters appeared on June 10, 1863.

At the end of that year it was republished in book form, in two volumes, and has been frequently republished since then. In 1866 an edition, illustrated by Gustave Doré, was brought out and met with considerable success.

Mme. Judith Gautier, the author's eldest daughter, in an interesting preface written by her for a special edition of her father's works, supplies a curious bit of information concerning the mode of payment adopted in this case. Gautier was paid for each page by itself, the remuneration being twenty francs a page. Each page was stamped on the back with the word "Paid," so that there should be no mistake about the matter, and the amount thus handed over to the writer was subsequently deducted from the royalty due him.

INTRODUCTION

"Captain Fracasse" is, on the whole, a more carefully wrought tale than most of those Gautier had produced, and for a very good reason: he was not so much hurried in the composition and could bestow greater pains upon the style and the study of the characters. For there are characters in the novel, and not simply, as is too often the case in Romanticist literature, mere puppets and shadows. Sigognac himself, the hero, is perhaps not very living, any more than Isabella, but Blazius unquestionably does live, and becomes associated in the mind with the cognate character in Alfred de Musset's "On ne badine pas avec l'amour." And poor Captain Hector, the Swash-buckler, is a striking figure also, and one not to be forgotten, while Zerbina, though occupying, like these other two, a secondary position, manages to impress herself on the imagination and the memory as she did on the fancy and the roving heart of the Marquis de Bruyères. Lampourde, the hired bravo, the young Duke de Vallombreuse, Yolande herself, who merely flashes through the novel here and there, have something so human and so true about them that, spite of the melodramatic manner in which they are employed by their creator, they strike one as above the average, very much above the average, of Romanticist characters.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“Captain Fracasse” is a picaresque novel, to a certain extent; it also is a cloak and sword tale, as might be expected from a writer so enamoured of Spain as was Gautier; it has reminiscences of Rabelais, particularly in the luscious descriptions of good cheer and deep drinking, with recollections of Scarron’s “Roman comique,” and traces of the influence of Walter Scott and the “Bride of Lammermoor.” The influence of the great Romanticist chief, Victor Hugo, is also quite noticeable, and the theories and doctrines of the famous Preface to “Cromwell” are here applied and put into practice, especially in the free use of the so-called “grotesque,” by which Hugo and his followers set so much store.

The time at which the action of the story is supposed to take place has caused some discussion; not that it is of very great moment, but that Gautier has not specified it clearly. There are, however, abundant indications of the approximate period, in the descriptions of costume, in the use of language, and in the enumeration of dramas then in vogue. But there is a certain convenience, so far as the author himself is concerned, in leaving the date somewhat vague. Suffice it to say that the time is that of the reign of Louis XIII, between 1630 and 1640, a period known to have been a favourite with Gautier, in common with nearly all his fellow-Romanticists.

INTRODUCTION

The plot is not very complex; indeed, it is simple. Two young people meet, fall in love, encounter just enough adventures and incur just enough perils to make the account of that love interesting, and then they marry. There is of course a leading villain and a subordinate one, with a group of tools that serve the former and are invariably worsted in their encounters with the hero. The heroine, on the other hand, falls a prey to the leading villain in a manner calculated to alarm the unpractised reader of novels as to her ultimate fate, but she is of course gallantly rescued at the proper psychological moment by her lover and his band of faithful followers, while a recognition entirely in the taste and spirit of the drama of that day occurs near the end of the book and changes the aspect of the heroine's fortunes. Finally the kindly fairy that has had somewhat to do with the working out of the plot leads the hero to the precise spot where an enormous treasure had once been buried by a clever Gascon, who must have anticipated precisely such a crisis in the affairs of his descendant.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

There is an apparent determination, or intention, at least, on the part of the author, to end everything well, and not to keep the reader too long on the tenter-hooks of suspense. Poetical justice is meted out to the villains, the leading one becoming suddenly converted by the strange recognition that takes place, and turning into a perfectly delightful and useful character, while the minor rascals expiate their sins on the gibbet, and one of them thus gives opportunity for a dramatic and effective scene. It must be owned that the novel is romantic throughout ; it is a blossoming of the ideas that the Romanticist writers entertained and upheld ; it is of a simplicity of combination in many parts that brings a smile to the lips of the blasé reader of fiction and makes him wonder how people in the sixties could be simple-minded enough to call this high art, and could be interested in it to the extent they were. And having made all these sage and eminently sound reflections, the blasé reader discovers that he also has been caught by the charm of the book and has been carried away by the easy, lightsome manner of the author.

INTRODUCTION

The hero, Sigognac, is essentially of the Romanticist brood, but with touches that came direct from Gautier's own personality. He did not wish to make him quite a Don Quixote, a Knight of the Doleful Countenance, any more than he cared to make him an insufferable Didier or an eccentric Hernani or an idiot like Ruy Blas. There was to be something of the Quixote about him, just enough of that touch of romance and chivalry which for ever endears the Knight of La Mancha to readers; and something of the Hernani, for Sigognac had to be the representative of an ancient and illustrious race, fallen upon evil days, but maintaining intact its high standard of honour and its wholly unpractical notions; something of the passionate lover, too, that Didier is, but withal a new and personal creation of Gautier's own, and in this it is certain that he has succeeded.

Sigognac recalls Eudore, in Chateaubriand's "Martyrs," for like that interesting young warrior and lover, he is the last of his race. And strange and powerful was the spell wrought upon the imagination of Romanticists by that not uncommon condition: "the last of his race.” The mere fact that a man had no relations seemed to confer a distinction upon him that all the virtues in the world could not have given him. To be the last of one’s race forcibly compelled attention and respect, and demanded a hearing for the adventures of the fortunate unfortunate. So Sigognac has the ironic melancholy which befits so highly privileged a character, and he is necessarily dressed in a way to win for him the sympathy and admiration of all tender-hearted females and callow youths; for it is undeniable that a man clad in well-worn, rusty garments extremely out of the fashion, is far more worthy of gaining the love of the fair and the admiration of youths in their salad days than a personage decently clad in the latest mode. Then he is not only ragged and sombre, but he is idle, and that is an all-conquering charm. Out upon the coarse fellow that will not sit down meekly under the stroke of fate and be content to starve picturesquely between his cat and his dog, with his old retainer for a vis-à-vis! Such an one is unworthy to be sung by a poet or chosen as a hero by a romancer. Sigognac duly fulfils the mission of the woe-begone, hungry, out-at-elbows gallant, and the more thoroughly that he has no will in particular and drifts along with the current wherever it may take him. He redeems himself, however, in the eyes of those who do not admire the good-for-nothing, and determines that, whether noble or commoner, he will not sponge upon the poor strolling players for a living; he manfully makes up his mind to sink his prejudices and aristocratic objections to earning his daily bread, and joins the company as a recruit. From that moment he becomes infinitely more interesting and his adventures are followed with great pleasure.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

INTRODUCTION

When he enters upon the practice of the profession he has adopted and makes his first attempt at representing the braggart, cowardly Hector who is the hero of the farce, his performance has suggested to Gautier the sketch of a character destined to be made immortal by a later writer, Alphonse Daudet. Bellombre's description of the personage, Captain Fracasse, whom Sigognac is endeavouring to create, at once recalls that most delightful and entertaining Tartarin de Tarascon, who, like Fracasse, was at once a hero bold and a coward of the whitest liver.

It was a happy thought, even if suggested by Scarron's "Roman comique," that led Gautier to present to his readers a company of strolling players in the early part of the seventeenth century. The Italian players, first called to France by the Valois kings, favoured by Henry IV and his successor, and expelled late in the days of Louis XIV on account of their impertinent allusion to the great Mme. de Maintenon, were instrumental in developing the French comic drama and some of the best comic actors of that nation, Molière among others, who studied the performances of the celebrated Scaramouch greatly to his own profit. While the monopoly of the higher class of plays granted to the Brotherhood of the Passion in Paris prevented independent companies from performing in the capital save by leave of that very grasping corporation, there was no such restriction in the provinces, and there more than one troupe travelled to and fro, performing comedies, farces, and tragedies, to the great delight of the country folk and of the nobles in their castles and mansions.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

It is the life of these wandering players that Gautier has admirably retraced in "Captain Fracasse," and the names of the members of the company of which Sigognac becomes a member, are the typical appellations of the characters then most in favour with the public. The various towns in Italy had furnished characters that were known by the name of the profession or business of the original: the Doctor, the Pedant, the Merchant; and the soldier, constantly met with in those turbulent days, when war was almost the normal condition of society and pursued by great and small alike, was necessarily an important figure on the stage. Spain and Italy between them gave birth to the "Matamore," the type of the bragging, boastful trooper, whose courage was not always up to the pitch of his pretensions, and whose mishaps proved a source of unending delight to the audiences that crowded the improvised theatres of the day. Gautier has admirably rendered this figure, so popular and so amusing, and he excels in representing the class of people who wandered round in the waggons and chariots one may even now study in the etchings of the famous Callot.

INTRODUCTION

He has had the art, also, of attaching the reader to his characters. Sigognac himself, spite of his too romantic appearance and super-excellence in all things, interests us, and Isabella, sweet and pure amid surroundings well calculated to corrupt a stronger nature than hers, is winsome indeed. The old Pedant, drunken rascal though he be, is a good old fellow, and the Tyrant has something very attractive about him. Of all, however, it is the Swashbuckler, the

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Hector of the company, who most enlists sympathy and kindly interest. The butt of all the jokes, the clown of the troupe, there is a genuineness about the man, an earnestness in the discharge of the functions he has assumed that compel respect, and his sad end does not leave the reader unmoved.

Here again Gautier has exhibited rare power. The whole book is full of very striking, dramatic, effective scenes. The arrival of the strollers at Poverty Hall, itself so well described; the brilliant performance at Bruyères; the blizzard and the death of the Swash-buckler — a very strong bit of work; the death of the poor old horse, fighting to the last and gallantly striving to do its duty; the attack of Lampourde, the hired bravo, and the exciting duel between him and Sigognac; the fight in the castle, when the company seeks to rescue Isabella from the clutches of the Duke of Vallombreuse; the dramatic arrival of the Prince his father, and, finally, the death of Agostino, are passages of a very high order of merit.

Of course everything ends happily, and Sigognac and Isabella marry and are happy ever after. And this ending would seem to be the proper one for so romantic a tale, in which neither reader nor author cares to delve too deep into the realities of life. But it is a curious and interesting fact that this dénouement is by no means that which Gautier had originally settled upon.

INTRODUCTION

On July 3, 1878, the Figaro published a notice of the comic opera which had been drawn from the novel. The article was by Arnold Mortier, and in it he stated that the "happy ever after" ending of the book was not that which Gautier had first devised. Far from ending brightly, the novel was to have come to a sad close. Vallombreuse did not recover from the wound inflicted upon him by Sigognac, who consequently could no longer wed Isabella. He retired to his ruinous castle, and there wasted away in the company of Miraut, Beelzebub, and old Peter, whom death removed one after another. Sigognac, forgotten by Isabella, who married some other man, at last starved to death in his ancestral home, forsaken and solitary. This enabled Gautier to describe the awful wretchedness of the place, and instead of Happiness Hall to present the Tower of Famine. Mme. Judith Gautier, in the preface referred to above, confirmed the statement. But few will feel disposed to quarrel with the author for having ended his novel happily, since, after all, people, the reading public especially, are quite as fond of the romanesque now as in the days of Romanticism, as is proved by the vogue of the innumerable tales of adventure, love, and war with which the market is flooded nowadays.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The chapters entitled "My Private Menagerie," which follow at the end of this translation of "Captain Fracasse," have no connection with that story. But as they exhibit Gautier — who has dwelt affectionately on the attachment of Miraut and Beelzebub to their master — in the light of a lover of animals as well as of art, they appeared to form a suitable appendix to his best known and most widely read tale. They originally appeared in the Vogue Parisienne between January 8 and March 12, 1869, under the title Histoire de mes bêtes, and were republished in book form the same year under the title Ménagerie intime.

Captain Fracasse

C A P T A I N F R A C A S S E

I POVERTY HALL

IN the reign of Louis XIII there stood on the slope of one of the bare hills that rise here and there on the Landes, between Dax and Mont-de-Marsan, a country-seat of the sort commonly met with in Gascony, and which the peasantry call châteaux.

The corners of the building were flanked by two round towers with conical roofs; and on the façade two deeply cut grooves spoke of the anterior existence of a drawbridge, reduced to a state of sinecure by the filling up of the moat. The towers, with their pepper-pot look-outs and their swallow-tailed vanes, gave the manor house quite a feudal aspect, while the deep green of a mantle of ivy that had covered one of them contrasted happily with the gray tones of the already old stonework.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

A wayfarer observing the place from a distance and noting its pointed gables standing out against the sky, above the broom and the heath, would have come to the conclusion that it was a very suitable habitation for a country nobleman; but, had he drawn nearer, he would have changed his mind. Intrusive mosses and parasitical plants had reduced the way leading to the dwelling from the road, to a narrow white path that looked like a faded galloon upon a well-worn cloak. Two ruts filled with rain water and inhabited by frogs testified to the fact that carriages had once been in the habit of driving that way, while the sense of security exhibited by the batrachians proved that they had long been in possession and were certain of not being disturbed.

Great yellow, leprous-looking patches stained the brown and disjointed tiles on the roofs, the rotten rafters having given way in places. The rusty vanes, pointing each to a different quarter, could no longer revolve; the dormer windows were closed with wooden shutters, weather-worn and split. The barbicans of the towers were filled up with stones; of the twelve windows on the front, eight were boarded up with planks; the others were glazed with bottle glass that shook in the lead setting at the least breath of wind. The plastering between these windows having come away in flakes, like the skin of an invalid, had laid bare the disjointed bricks, and the dressed stones were worn away by the pernicious influence of the moon. A lintel of stone, the regular rugosities on which denoted an old ornamentation damaged by time and want of care, framed in a door above which showed a dilapidated coat of arms which the cleverest herald could not have made out, and the lambrequins of which curled fantastically with many a break. The leaves of the door still preserved, in their upper part, a few remains of red paint and seemed to blush at their condition of decay. Diamond-headed nails held together the split planking and formed symmetrical designs broken in places. One of the leaves only opened, and proved sufficient for the accommodation of the dwellers, evidently not numerous, in the place. Against the jamb of the door rested a dismantled wheel, falling into pieces, and plainly the last remnant of a carriage that had passed away during the preceding reign. The tops of the chimneys and the corners of the windows disappeared under the numbers of swallows' nests, and but for a thin wisp of smoke that rose from a brick flue and twisted like a tendril, as on the drawings of houses sketched by schoolboys on the margin of their text-books, it might have been thought the dwelling was uninhabited. Yet meagre must have been the fare being prepared on that hearth, for a trooper could have produced more smoke with his pipe. This was the single sign of life about the place, which resembled a dying man whose breath alone shows he is still alive.

POVERTY HALL

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

On pushing open the movable leaf which yielded only under protest, and turned with evident bad temper upon its creaking and rusty hinges, one entered under a sort of groined vaulted archway, older than the rest of the building, and divided by four round mouldings of bluish granite, that met, at their point of intersection, in a projecting stone on which were seen, less deteriorated, the arms carved on the outside: azure, three storks or, — so far as could be made out in the shadow of the archway. To the wall were fixed iron extinguishers blackened by the torches, and iron rings to which visitors' horses were formerly made fast, a very unusual occurrence at this time, if one might judge by the dust accumulated upon them.

POVERTY HALL

From this porch, in which two doors opened, the one leading to the apartments on the ground-floor, the other to a hall that might have been at one time the guard-room — was entered a gloomy, bare, chilly court enclosed by high walls that winter had rayed with long black streaks. In the corners of the court, upon the rubbish fallen from the broken cornices, grew nettles, wild oats, and hemlock, while the paving-stones were set in grass.

At the back a flight of steps, with a stone balustrade ornamented with balls surmounted by spikes, led to a garden lying below the level of the court. The broken and disjointed steps tipped under the feet or were held together only by the filaments of mosses and [wall-plants. On the revetment wall of the terrace grew stone-crop, wallflowers, and Jerusalem artichokes.

As for the garden itself, it was quietly dropping back into the condition of a thicket or a virgin forest. Save one bed, in which a few cabbages with veined verdi-grised leaves showed their round forms, and where the presence of golden suns with black centres testified to some sort of cultivation of the ground they starred, nature was reasserting its rights over this uncared-for space, and was destroying the traces of man's work, which it seems to love to destroy.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The greedy branches of the uncut trees spread in every direction. The box, intended to mark the outlines of the borders and the walks, had grown into shrubs, having been untouched by the shears for many a long year. Seeds borne hither by the wind had taken root here and there, and were shooting up, with the vigorous robustness peculiar to weeds, in the places formerly occupied by lovely flowers and rare plants. Thorny-spurred brambles grew athwart the paths and caught the passer-by to prevent his going farther and to conceal from him the mystery of gloom and desolation. Solitude does not like to be surprised in désabillé, and strews all manner of obstacles around herself.

If, however, careless of the scratches of the brambles and the switching of the branches, one persisted in following to the end the ancient walk that had become denser and more obstructed than a trail in the woods, a sort of rocaille niche, in imitation of a rustic grot, was reached. To the plants formerly set in the interstices of the rockery, such as iris, gladiolus, and dark-leaved ivy, others had been added, willow-weeds, hart's-tongue, and wild vines, hanging beardlike and half-concealing a marble statue of some mythological goddess, Flora or Pomona, which had no doubt been very attractive in its day and must have done honour to its maker, but was now flat-nosed as Death, that feature having been broken off. Instead of flowers the poor goddess carried rotten and venomous-looking mushrooms in her basket, and seemed itself to have been poisoned, its body, of yore so white, being spotted with brown mossy stains. At its feet, under a greenish curtain of water lentils, stagnated, in a stone shell, a brown puddle, left there by the rains; for the lion's mouth, that could be made out still with some trouble, no longer spouted water, as it had ceased to receive any from the conduits that were either stopped up or destroyed.

POVERTY HALL

This grotesque cabinet, as such grottoes were then called, betokened, ruined though it was, a certain amount of comfort now vanished, and the possession of artistic tastes by the former owners of the place. Had the statue been properly cleaned and restored, it would have been found to be in the Florentine style of the Renaissance, in the manner of the Italian sculptors who came to France in the train of Master Rosso, the Primaticcio, which was probably the time when the now fallen family had reached the height of its splendour.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The grotto was placed against a wall covered with moss saltpetre, on which were still visible remains of trellis-work, intended, no doubt, to mask the wall, when it was built, with a curtain of leafy climbing plants. The wall, scarcely seen through the wild leafage of the trees that had grown unchecked, closed the garden on this side, and beyond stretched the moor, with its dull, low horizon dappled with heath.

Returning towards the mansion, the façade at the back was seen, even more damaged and weather-worn than the one just described, the last owners having endeavoured to preserve appearances at least, and having concentrated their inadequate resources on that side.

In the stables, where twenty horses could have been easily put up, a thin nag, the bones sticking out on its quarters, was extracting from an empty manger a few straws with its yellow, gumless teeth, and from time to time turned toward the door its eye sunk within a socket wherein the Montfaucon rats would not have found a vestige of fat. At the door of the kennel, a single dog, settled in its skin that was too large for it and on which its relaxed muscles showed in flabby lines, was dozing, resting its muzzle upon the not very well stuffed pillow formed by its paws. It appeared to be so thoroughly accustomed to the loneliness of the place as to have entirely given up watching, and was not disturbed, as is the custom of dogs, even when asleep, by the faintest noise that made itself heard.

POVERTY HALL

The dwelling was entered by a huge stair with a wooden balustrade. There were but two landing-places, for the building was two stories high only, of stone up to the level of the first floor, and of brick and timber above that. On the walls, grisaille paintings, devoured by damp, had apparently been intended to simulate, with the aid of chiar-oscuro and perspective, the projections of richly ornamented architecture. There could still be partially made out a row of Hercules ending in thermæ, and supporting a cornice with modules, from which sprang in a graceful curve an arbour of festooned foliage of the vine, through which could be seen a sky with the colour gone out of it, and provided with unknown islands by the leaking in of rain water. Between the Hercules, busts of Roman emperors and other illustrious historical personages pompously exhibited themselves in painted niches; but everything was so faded, so destroyed, so shadowy as to be the phantom of painting rather than real painting, and that it ought to be described with shadowy words, ordinary vocables being too substantial for the purposes. The echoes of the empty place seemed startled at repeating the sound of footsteps.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

A green door, the serge of which had turned yellow, and was only kept in place by a few nails from which the gilding had vanished, led into a room that had possibly been the dining-room in the fabulous times when people ate in that deserted house. A great beam divided the ceiling into two compartments, crossed by apparent rafters, the space between which had formerly been covered with a coat of blue, now concealed by the dust and cobwebs that no maid's brush ever sought to disturb at that height. Above the antique chimney spread the antlers of a stag of ten tines, and along the walls grimaced on darkened canvases smoky portraits representing warriors in armour, their helmets beside them or held by a page, and staring at the beholder with deep black eyes, the only living things in their dead faces; noblemen in velvet gowns, their heads resting on ruffles stiff with starch, like heads of Saint John the Baptist on silver salvers; dowagers in old-fashioned dresses, frightfully livid, and acquiring, in consequence of the decomposition of the pigments, the look of strygæ, lamiæ, and empusæ. The very coarseness of the work, done by country daubers, imparted to the paintings an uncouth and grim aspect. Some had no frames; others had frames the gilt on which had turned dull and rusty. In the corner of every one appeared the arms of the family and the age of the personage represented. Nevertheless, whether the age was advanced or not, there was not much apparent difference between these heads with yellowed lights, darkened shadows, smoky varnish, and powdered with dust. Two or three of these mouldy paintings, covered with a bloom of mildew, had tones like those of decomposing bodies, and proved that the last descendant of these high-born warriors was absolutely indifferent to the fate of the effigies of his noble ancestors.

POVERTY HALL

At night, in the uncertain light of lamps, that mute and immobile gallery must have been transformed into a line of phantoms at once terrifying and absurd. Nothing can be sadder than forgotten portraits in deserted rooms; reproductions, themselves half effaced, of forms long since turned to dust.

Yet, such as they were, these painted phantoms were guests well suited to the desolate solitude of the place; real inhabitants would have seemed too living in that dead house.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

In the centre of the room stood a table of blackened pear-wood, the legs turned in spirals like Salomonic pillars, and pierced with innumerable holes by worms that had been undisturbed in the prosecution of their silent work. The layer of fine gray dust that covered the surface, and on which one could have written with the finger, showed that the table was not often laid.

Two dressers or sideboards of the same material, adorned with a few carvings and which had probably been acquired, as well as the table, in happier days, were placed opposite each other on either side of the room; chipped china glasses that did not match, and two or three small pieces of Palissy ware, representing eels, fishes, crabs, and shells in enamel on a ground of verdure, made a poor showing upon the empty shelves.

Five or six chairs, covered with velvet that might once have been flame-coloured, but that time and wear had turned yellowish-red, allowed the stuffing to escape from the torn places in the cloth, and limped upon uneven legs like crippled mercenaries returning homewards after the battle. It would have been imprudent for any one not a spirit to sit down upon them, and no doubt the seats were called into use only when the company of ancestors, emerging from their frames, sat themselves down at the empty table during the long winter nights that are so suitable for spectral banquets, and while partaking of an imaginary supper conversed with each other on the decadence of the family.

POVERTY HALL

This hall led into another and smaller one, the walls of which were covered with Flemish tapestries of the kind called “greeneries.” But the expression “tapestries” is not intended here to suggest unaccustomed luxury; for in this case they were worn, threadbare, and faded; the stitching of the breadths had given way, and these, gaping in many a place, hung together held only by a few threads and the force of habit. The discoloured trees were yellow on the one side and blue on the other; a heron, standing on one leg in the rushes, was badly moth-eaten; the Flemish farm, with its well covered with hop-vines, was scarcely discernible, and the wan face of the huntsman, in pursuit of wild duck, looked like the waxen visage of a dead body the lips of which have been painted with vermilion and the eyebrows darkened, for the original red and black colouring had remained on those features alone, the dye having apparently been of a faster shade.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Draughts of air blew between the wall and the loose hangings, making the tapestries flap in suspicious fashion. Had Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, been talking in that room, he would have drawn his sword and pinked Polonius behind the arras crying, "A rat!" Innumerable little noises, the imperceptible whispers of solitude, making the silence more painfully felt, troubled the ear and mind of visitors bold enough to push so far. Mice gnawed hungrily a few bits of wool at the bottom of the seamy side of the warp; worms bit at the wood of the beams with a muffled, file-like sound, and the death-watch ticked in the panneling of the wainscoting. At times, just as if solitude, feeling weary, were stretching its limbs, some piece of furniture cracked unexpectedly, and made the listener start nervously in spite of himself.

In one corner of the room stood a four-poster bedstead, with spindle pillars, hung round with brocatelle curtains, gaping at every fold, the green and white pattern on which had faded into a uniform yellowish shade. No one would have dared to part these curtains for fear of finding a spectral form crouching in the shadow, or, under the white sheet, a stiffened shape with sharp nose, prominent cheekbones, hands folded, and feet arranged like those of a statue upon a tombstone, — so quickly do the things that have been made for man assume a supernatural air as soon as man has abandoned them. But for the fact that the folds, in their sinister and mysterious stiffness destroyed any idea of love, it might have been thought that some young princess under a spell was sleeping in it as soundly as did the Sleeping Beauty in her enchanted castle.

POVERTY HALL

A table of black wood, inlaid with brass, now loose ; a dulled and distorted mirror, the silvering of which had run, as if weary of having no human face to reflect ; an arm-chair upholstered in fine embroidery, a work of patience and leisure due to some ancestress, but in which could be made out only a few silver threads amid the faded silk and wool, completed the furniture of the room, which, at a pinch, might have been lived in by a man who feared not ghosts nor spectres.

These two rooms were lighted by the two windows in the façade that had not been walled up. A faint, greenish light filtered in through the ground-glass panes that looked as though silvered outside, and that had not been cleaned for a hundred years. Long curtains, worn on the folds and that would have torn apart had any one tried to slide them along the rusty iron rods, deepened the already dim twilight and added to the gloom of the place.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

On opening the door at the end of this room, one entered into Cimmerian darkness, void, obscurity, and the unknown. Little by little the eye became used to the shadows, through which gleamed a few livid rays of light that filtered through the chinks of the planks with which the windows were boarded up, and then could be made out a suite of rooms every one out of repair, with uneven floors, strewn with broken window-glass, walls either bare or hung with remnants of ragged, unravelled tapestries, ceilings in which the laths showed and through which the rain came, admirably fitted, in a word, for the holding of the Sanhedrim of rats and the States-general of bats. It would have been unsafe to walk in some places, for the flooring rose and sank under the foot, but no one ever ventured within this Thebaid of darkness, dust, and cobwebs. A sickening odour, a smell of mould and solitude, the dank, darksome chill peculiar to sombre places, struck one on the very threshold, just as when one raises the stone covering a cellar and bends over the icy obscurity. And it was indeed the dead body of the past that was slowly crumbling into dust in those rooms wherein the present never entered, and the years sunk in sleep that were cradled as in hammocks in the gray cobwebs in the corners.

POVERTY HALL

The attics above were the refuge, during the daytime, of feathery-eared, cat-headed, and shining-eyed owls, the roof, broken in a score of places, allowing these amiable birds to come and go freely, feeling as safe and comfortable there as in the ruins of Monthléry or Château Gaillard. Every night the dusty flock issued forth with screams and hootings that would have terrified the superstitious, and set forth to seek afar the food it could not discover in this Tower of Hunger.

The ground-floor rooms were empty save for a few bundles of straw, stalks of maize, and various small gardening implements. In one there was a mattress filled with leaves of Indian corn, with a cover of dark-brown stuff, that appeared to be the bed of the single servant in the house.

As my reader is no doubt tired of traversing this solitude, wretchedness, and loneliness, let me take him to the only room in the deserted mansion in which there was any appearance of life,—to the kitchen, from the chimney of which rose in the heavens that light white vapour mentioned in the description of the exterior of the place.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The yellow flame of a meagre fire licked the back of the fireplace, and occasionally reached the bottom of an iron pipkin hanging on the crane, while its feeble light touched with a red spark in the shadows the edges of one or two stewpans on the wall. The daylight, streaming down the great flue that rose to the roof without a bend, fell softly in bluish tints upon the ashes, making the fire look paler yet, so that the very flame seemed to be frozen on that cold hearth. Had it not been for the cover, the rain would have fallen into the pot and the broth would have been diluted by the storm. The water, slowly heated, had at last begun to boil, and the pipkin wheezed in the silence like an asthmatic patient. A few cabbage-leaves, thrown up by the boiling, indicated that the cultivated part of the garden had been laid under contribution for the making of this more than Spartan broth.

An old thin, black cat, its fur resembling that of a worn-out muff, and showing in the bare places the bluish skin beneath, was seated on its tail as near the fire as it dared without singeing its whiskers, and stared at the pipkin with its green eyes, the pupils in the form of an I, with an air of interested supervision. Its ears had been cut close to the head, and its tail close to the rump, making it look like one of those Japanese monsters that are placed in cabinets among other curiosities, or else like one of those fantastic animals that witches, bound for the sabbath, intrust with the care of skimming the pot in which they are brewing their philters. That cat, quite alone in the kitchen, seemed to be making soup for its own personal use, and no doubt it had also set out upon the oaken table the plate adorned with red and green bouquets, the pewter goblet, polished, probably, with its claws, so marked with streaks was it, and the earthenware jug, on the paunch of which were to be seen, coarsely done in blue, the same arms that figured on the entrance porch, the keystone, and the portraits.

POVERTY HALL

For whom was intended this modest repast served in this deserted manor? Possibly for the familiar spirit of the house, the genius loci, the kobold faithful to the home it had adopted; and the black cat with the deeply mysterious eyes was awaiting its coming in order to wait upon it, a serviette under its arm.

The pipkin boiled on, and the cat remained motionless at its post, like a sentinel whose relief has been forgotten. At last a step sounded outside, heavy and slow, like that of an aged person. A slight cough made itself heard, the latch creaked, and an old man, half peasant, half servant, entered the kitchen.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

On seeing the new-comer, the cat, apparently an old friend, left the ashes on the hearth and rubbed itself in friendly fashion against his legs, rounding its back, putting out and drawing in its claws, and producing in its throat that purring sound which is the highest sign of satisfaction used by the feline race.

“All right, all right, Beelzebub,” said the old man bending down and passing his horny hand upon the cat’s back two or three times, as if he wished not to be outdone in politeness by the animal; “all right! I know that you are fond of me, and we are lonely enough here, my poor master and I, not to be heedless of the caresses of an animal that has no soul, but that seems to understand us all the same.”

This exchange of civilities over, the cat proceeded to walk in front of the man, guiding him towards the chimney, as if for the purpose of indicating the location of the pipkin, upon which it gazed with a most pathetic look of hungry desire; for Beelzebub was growing old, its hearing was less sharp, its sight less keen, and its paw less agile than of yore; consequently its success in stalking birds and mice had become markedly less frequent. Thus it was that it kept its eyes upon the broth of which it hoped to have a share, a hope that made it lick its chops in anticipation.

POVERTY HALL

Peter, such was the old servant's name, took a handful of brushwood and cast it upon the half-dead fire; the branches crackled and twisted, and soon the flame flashed bright and clear from amidst a cloud of smoke, sending out a delightful volley of sparks. It was just as if salamanders had been enjoying themselves and dancing sarabands in the flames. A poor consumptive cricket, carried away by the warmth and the brightness, even tried to accompany it with its chirp, but failed to produce anything more than a hoarse sound.

Under the great mantel of the chimney, with its old vandyked lambrequin of green serge, turned yellow by the smoke, Peter sat down upon a wooden stool, with Beelzebub by his side. The fire lighted up his face, tanned to a darker colour than that of a native of the Caribbees by age, sunshine, the open air, and the inclemencies of the weather. A few locks of white hair, escaping from under his blue cap and plastered on his temples, brought out still more strongly the red brick colour of his dark complexion, while his black eyebrows contrasted with his snowy locks. He had the long Basque face and hooked nose, like the beak of a bird of prey. Long perpendicular wrinkles, resembling sabrecuts, furrowed his face from top to bottom.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

A sort of livery coat with faded braiding, and of a colour that a professional painter would have been puzzled to define, half covered his chamois-leather jacket, polished and blackened in places by the rubbing of the cuirass, the result being that the yellow tone of the leather had acquired greenish tints like those that show on the breast of a very gamy partridge; for Peter had been a soldier, and his civilian dress was eked out in parts by a few remnants of his military harness. His not very full breeches showed the warp and woof of the stuff as plainly as if it had been embroidery canvas, and it was quite impossible to determine whether they had originally been of cloth, petersham, or serge; the nap had long since disappeared from these shining trews, and never was eunuch's chin smoother than they. The weaker places were darned by a hand evidently more accustomed to handle a sword than a needle, and these plainly visible mendings testified to the care taken by the owner of the garment to make it last as long as possible. Like unto Nestor, these aged breeches had seen three generations of men. There were serious grounds for believing that they had once been red, but this important point is not absolutely established.

POVERTY HALL

The cord soles, fastened by blue lacings to the legs of woollen stockings, which served Peter in the stead of shoes, recalled Spanish alpargatas. No doubt this coarse form of cothurn had been selected as more economical than the bow-adorned shoe or the flapped boot; for rigorous, deliberate, and cleanly poverty was manifest in the smallest details of the old man's attire, and even in his attitude, that betrayed dejected resignation. Leaning against the inner wall of the chimney-place, he clasped his knee with his big hands, reddened by purple tones like those of vine leaves at the end of autumn, and formed a motionless pendant to the cat, Beelzebub, that, curled up in the ashes in front of him, watched with hungry and pitiful look, full of deepest attention, the asthmatic boiling of the pot.

"Young master is very late returning to-day," murmured Peter, as he noted through the yellowed and smoky panes of the single kitchen-window the last luminous glow of sunset fade and die away in the sky laden with heavy rain clouds. "What enjoyment can he find in walking about the moors all alone? It is true that this place is so melancholy that it would be difficult to feel more weary anywhere else."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

A joyous and hoarse bark was now heard; the horse in its stable stamped and rattled upon the edge of its manger the chain by which it was fastened; the black cat broke off making a bit of toilet by passing its wet paw upon its chops and behind its cropped ears, and walked towards the door like an affectionate and well-bred animal that knows its duty and performs it.

The door opened; Peter rose, respectfully removed his cap, and the new-comer entered the room preceded by the old dog of which I have spoken, and which tried to leap up on him and fell back heavily, handicapped by age. Beelzebub did not exhibit towards Miraut the antipathy its fellows generally entertain for the canine race; on the contrary it looked at the dog in most friendly fashion, arching its back and rolling its green eyes. It was plain that they were old friends and often kept each other company in the solitary mansion.

Baron de Sigognac, for it was the lord of the ruinous castle who had just entered the kitchen, was a young fellow twenty-five or twenty-six years of age, though at first sight he would have been thought older, so grave and serious did he appear. The feeling of powerlessness, the consequence of poverty, had driven the brightness from his features and dispelled the springtime bloom that mantles youthful faces. His sunken eyes were already circled with dark rings, and his hollow cheeks brought out all the more strongly his prominent cheekbones. His mustaches, instead of being gallantly curled up, drooped low and seemed to weep on either side of his sad mouth. His hair, carelessly dressed, fell in black locks adown his pale face with a lack of coquetry rare in a young man who might well have passed for handsome, and testified to an absolute hopelessness of being attractive. A habitual secret sorrow had imprinted marks of grief upon a face that a little happiness would have made charming, and the resolution natural at his age seemed to have yielded to an ill-fortune against which he had uselessly struggled.

POVERTY HALL

Although active and of robust rather than weak constitution, the young Baron moved with apathetic slowness, like a man who has given up hopes of life. His gestures were sleepy and dead, his countenance inert, and it was plain that it was quite indifferent to him to be there or elsewhere, at home or away.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

On his head he wore an old gray felt hat, broken and misshapen, and a great deal too large for him, that fell down upon his eyes and compelled him, when he wished to look at anything, to throw his head back. A feather, the scanty web of which made it look like the backbone of a fish, was fastened in the hat, evidently with the intention of playing the part of a plume, but it hung limp behind as if ashamed of itself. A collar of old-fashioned lace, the open parts of which were not the result of the lace-maker's skill, and the number of which had been increased by age, fell upon a doublet the loose folds of which betokened that it had been cut for a taller and stouter man than the slightly built Baron. The sleeves of his jerkin concealed his hands after the fashion of the sleeves of a monk's frock, and his wide-topped boots, adorned with iron spurs, came up to his waist. This uncouth equipment had been that of his late father, who had died a few years before, and Sigognac was wearing out the paternal garments, ready though they had been to be handed over to the dealer in second-hand clothes at the time of their former owner's death. Thus accoutred in a dress that might have been quite in the fashion at the beginning of the late reign, the young Baron looked both ridiculous and pathetic, and might have been mistaken for his own grandfather. Although he professed the most filial veneration for his father's memory, and though tears often came into his eyes as he put on the dear relics, that seemed to preserve in their folds the gestures and the attitudes of the deceased nobleman, it was not quite from preference that young Sigognac arrayed himself in the paternal duds. The truth was he owned no other clothes, and had been uncommonly glad to discover this portion of his inheritance at the bottom of an old trunk. His youth's garments had become too small and too tight, and in his father's he was at his ease at least. Then the peasantry, accustomed to respect them when worn by the old Baron, did not consider them ridiculous when worn by the son, and saluted them just as deferentially. They noticed the tears in the doublet as little as the cracks in the castle walls. Poor though Sigognac was, he was still their lord, and the decadence of the family did not strike them as it did strangers, though it was really a rather grotesque and melancholy sight to see the young Baron go by in his old clothes, riding his old horse and accompanied by his old dog, like the knight in Albrecht Dürer's engraving of "The Knight, Death, and the Devil."

POVERTY HALL

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Sigognac silently sat down at the little table, after having acknowledged with a kindly gesture of the hand Peter's respectful greeting.

The latter took the pipkin from the crane, poured its contents into a plate of ordinary earthenware, in which there lay already a slice of bread, and placed the whole before the Baron. It was the common sort of soup made of rye bread, cabbage, and bacon, still eaten in Gascony under the name of "garbure." He next drew from the cupboard a block of "miassou" quivering upon a serviette dusted with maize flour, and brought it to the table upon the board on which it was placed. This local dish, together with the "garbure," enriched with a bit of bacon, borrowed no doubt, to judge from its small size, from the bait of a mouse-trap, constituted the Baron's frugal meal. He ate with an absent-minded air between Beelzebub and Miraut, both gazing ecstatically upon him with heads up, one on each side of his chair, waiting for some crumb of the feast to fall to them. From time to time the Baron threw to Miraut, who did not allow the morsel to reach the floor, a piece of bread that he had pointed at the bacon, in order to give it at least the smell of meat, while the skin became the cat's share, Beelzebub evincing its satisfaction by growling low and stretching out one paw, with every claw bare as if prepared to defend its prey.

POVERTY HALL

The meagre repast ended, the Baron seemed to sink into painful reflections or at least into a train of thought that had nothing very pleasant about it. Miraut rested his head on his master's knee and fixed upon him eyes that age was dimming with a bluish film, but which a spark of almost human intelligence strove to pierce. He appeared to understand the Baron's thoughts and to try to manifest his sympathy for him. Beelzebub was purring loudly and uttering little plaintive cries in its efforts to attract the Baron's attention to itself. Peter remained standing a little way off, motionless as one of the tall granite statues that are to be seen in cathedral porches, respecting his master's reverie and waiting to receive his orders.

Meanwhile night had fallen, and deep shadows were growing in the corners of the kitchen like swarms of bats that cling with the claws of their membranous wings to the angles of the walls. The flickering fire, revived by the gusts blowing down the chimney, coloured with quaint reflections the group collected round the table in a sort of sad intimacy brought out more strongly still by the melancholy solitude of the mansion. Of a once rich and powerful family none now remained save this lonely youth, wandering like a shadow through the home inhabited by his ancestors; of the numerous retinue there was left only one domestic, serving through devotion and who could have no successor; of the pack of thirty hunting-dogs survived but a single hound, almost blind and gray with age, while a black cat represented the soul of the home.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The Baron signed to Peter that he would withdraw, and Peter, bending down upon the hearth, lighted a splinter of pine wood, smeared with resin, a sort of cheap candle much used by the poorer peasantry, and started in front of his young lord, Miraut and Beelzebub joining the procession. The smoky light of the torch made the faded frescoes upon the walls of the staircase sway to and fro, and imparted a semblance of life to the darkened portraits in the dining-room, their black, staring eyes appearing to cast a look of sorrowful pity upon their descendant.

On reaching the fantastic bedroom I have described, the old servant lighted a small single copper lamp, the wick of which was curled up in the oil like a tape-worm in a bottle of spirits in an apothecary's window, and then withdrew, followed by Miraut. Beelzebub, who enjoyed the privilege of admission at all times, settled down in one of the arm-chairs; the Baron sank down upon another, overcome by solitude, lack of occupation, and weariness.

POVERTY HALL

Ghostly as the room looked in the daytime, it was infinitely worse at night in the uncertain light of the lamp; the tapestries turned livid in tone, and the huntsman, on the background of sombre verdure, became, thus lighted up, almost a real being. With his arquebuse at the ready, he looked like a murderer lying in wait for his victim, while his red lips contrasted still more forcibly with the pallor of his face. They had the appearance of a vampire's ensanguined mouth.

The lamp, owing to the damp, sputtered and cast an intermittent light; the wind moaned in the passages, and strange and terrifying sounds made themselves heard in the deserted rooms. The weather had turned bad, and great drops of rain, driven by the gusts, lashed the panes that trembled in their leaden settings. At times the sash seemed to bend inwards and to be about to blow open, as though some one were pressing against it outside. It was the knee of the storm pushing against the frail obstacle. At other times, as if to add a new note to the harmony, one of the owls roosting under the roof uttered a wail like the cry of a child being murdered, or, bothered by the light, dashed heavily against the window panes.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The lord of this dismal dwelling, accustomed to these lugubrious symphonies, paid no attention to them. Beelzebub alone, with the restlessness natural to its species, moved the roots of its cropped ears at every sound and gazed fixedly into the dark corners as if it perceived with its night-seeing eyes something invisible to the human glance. This, with its diabolical name and mien, would have terrified a man less brave than the Baron, for it looked as though it had learned many things in the course of its nocturnal rambles through the uninhabited rooms and garrets of the castle, and more than once at the end of a passage it must have come across things that would have turned a man's hair white with fear.

Sigognac took from a table a small volume, the faded binding of which bore his family escutcheon stamped upon it, and began to turn the leaves with a careless hand. While his eyes carefully followed the lines, his mind was elsewhere, or at least was not greatly fixed upon Ronsard's amorous sonnets and odes, notwithstanding their lovely rimes and their learned inventions renewed from the Greeks. He soon threw down the book and slowly began undoing his doublet, like a man who does not feel sleepy and who is going to bed simply because he does not know what to do with himself and is going to try to drown weariness in sleep. Mournfully indeed do the grains of sand drop in the hourglass on a dark and rainy night in a ruined castle amid an ocean of heath with not a single living being for thirty miles around.

POVERTY HALL

And in truth the young Baron, sole survivor of the Sigognac family, had abundant reasons to be melancholy. His ancestors had ruined themselves in various ways, either by gaming, by making war, or by the foolish desire to shine, so that each generation had handed down to its successor a patrimony that decreased steadily.

The fiefs, the farms, and the lands pertaining to the domain had vanished one after another, and the last Sigognac, after making incredible efforts to restore the fortunes of the family — efforts that were necessarily vain, for it is too late to stop the leaks when the vessel is sinking — had left to his son only the ruinous castle and the few acres of sterile land that surrounded it ; all the rest had had to be given up to Jews and creditors.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Thus it was that poverty had cradled the child in its thin arms and given his lips suck from dried-up breasts. When still quite young, he had lost his mother, who had died of melancholy in the ruinous castle, thinking of the misery that was later to weigh down upon her son and to close every career to him. He had never known the sweet caresses and the tender attentions that are the lot of childhood even in the least fortunate homes. His father's affection, which he nevertheless regretted, had generally manifested itself in the shape of kicks or orders to have him whipped. At this very moment he was so utterly dull that he would have welcomed one of those fatherly admonitions, the remembrance of which brought tears to his eyes ; for a kick from one's father is after all a mark of human relationship, and during the four years since the Baron had been laid in the Sigognac family vault, the young fellow had lived in the deepest solitude. His youthful pride revolted at the thought of mingling with the provincial nobility and in hunting-parties so long as he lacked the train that became his rank.

POVERTY HALL

And indeed what would people have said on seeing Baron de Sigognac dressed like an Hostière tramp or an apple-picker of Perche? It was this reflection that had kept him from offering his services as retainer to some prince or other. The consequence was that many believed the Sigognacs extinct, and forgetfulness, which grows over the dead even more rapidly than does the grass, was effacing the once rich and influential family, and very few persons were aware that there still remained a representative of the impoverished race.

For some time past Beelzebub had seemed uneasy, looking up as though scenting trouble, standing up to the window and leaning its paws upon the panes, trying to pierce the black obscurity of night and wrinkling and working its nose. Soon Miraut's prolonged howl rising in the silence confirmed the cat's pantomime. Plainly something uncommon was occurring in the vicinity of the usually quiet mansion. Miraut kept on barking with all the energy left him by his chronic state of hoarseness. The Baron, making ready for any eventuality, buttoned up his doublet, which he had begun to take off, and rose to his feet.

"What is the matter with Miraut, that he is making such a noise? Generally he snores like the Seven Sleepers' dog upon the straw in his kennel as soon as the sun has set. Can there be a wolf prowling round the walls?" said the young man to himself as he buckled on a sword with heavy iron shell hilt that he took down from the wall, and pulled the belt to the last hole, for the leather strap cut for the old Baron would have gone twice round the younger man's waist.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Three blows struck rather loudly on the castle gate sounded at regular intervals, and awoke the mournful echoes in the deserted rooms. Who could be coming at such an hour to disturb the solitude of the manor house and the silence of night? Who could be the ill-advised traveller knocking at a door that had not opened to a guest for so long,—not that the owner lacked for courtesy, but simply that no visitors had ever come that way? Who could possibly be seeking for admission to this inn of wretchedness, to this high court of fasting, to this hostel of poverty and famine?

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

II

THE CAR OF THESPIS

SIGOGNAC descended the stairs, shielding his lamp with his hand from the draughts of air that threatened to extinguish it. The light shone through his thin fingers and dyed them a diaphanous red, so that, although it was night and he was followed by a black cat instead of walking before the sun, he deserved the epithet applied by old Homer to Aurora's fingers.

He removed the bar of the door, opened the leaf, and found himself confronted by an individual in whose face he flashed his lamp. Thus illumined a rather grotesque countenance became visible against the background of darkness. A skull, the colour of rancid butter, shone in the light and the rain; gray hair plastered on the temples, a nose as red as the autumn vintage, adorned with grog-blossoms and swelling out like a bulb between two wall eyes, surmounted by very thick and curiously black brows, hanging cheeks marked with vinous tones and striated with red lines, a thick-lipped mouth like a drunkard's and a satyr's, a warty chin on which grew a few hairs as hard and rough as the bristles of a clothes-brush, combined to make up a face fit to figure as a mask under the cornice of the Pont-Neuf. A dash of kindness and cleverness tempered the somewhat unengaging aspect of the features, and, besides, the wrinkles round the eyes and the corners of the lips drawn up towards the ears betokened an intention to smile pleasantly. This queer face, showing above a ruff of questionable cleanliness, topped a body hung with a black smock-frock, that kept bowing up and down with affected exaggeration of politeness.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Having performed his salutations, the burlesque personage, forestalling the question about to be uttered by the Baron's lips, spoke in a slightly emphatic and declamatory tone:—

“Deign to forgive me, noble sir, if I knock in person at the postern of your fortress without having first sent on a page or a dwarf to sound the horn, and that at so late an hour. Necessity knows no law, and compels the most polite among the well-bred to indulge in laches of conduct.”

THE CAR OF THESPIS

“What do you want?” broke in the Baron rather sharply, annoyed by the old rascal’s verbiage.

“Hospitality for my comrades and myself, princes and princesses, Leanders and Isabellas, doctors and swashbucklers, who go from town to town on the car Thespis; the aforesaid car, drawn after the manner of the ancients by oxen, being at this moment stuck in a mud-hole not far from your residence.”

“So far as I can understand you, you are travelling play-actors and you have lost your way?”

“No one could better interpret my words,” replied the actor, “and all you say is gospel truth. May I hope that your lordship will grant my request?”

“Although my home is in very bad repair and I have nothing much to offer you, you will nevertheless be somewhat better off within than outside in the driving rain.”

The Pedant, for such seemed to be the part taken by him in the company, bowed by way of assent.

During the course of the conversation, Peter, awakened by Miraut’s barking, had risen and joined his master under the porch. Informed of what had happened, he lit a lantern and the three men proceeded in the direction of the mud-stuck cart.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The Leander and the Swashbuckler were heaving on the wheels, and the Tyrant was pricking the oxen with his tragedy dagger. The women, wrapped up in their cloaks, were bewailing their fate, wailing and shrieking. The unexpected reinforcement, and especially Peter's experience in such matters, soon enabled the heavy chariot to get out of the bad spot, and once drawn on firmer ground it ere long reached the mansion, rolled in under the porch, and was drawn up in the court-yard.

The oxen were unyoked and put into the stable by the side of the white nag; the actresses jumped down from the car and shook out their crushed dresses; then, preceded by Sigognac, they ascended to the dining-room, which was the most habitable part of the dwelling. Peter managed to discover in the wood-shed a faggot and a few handfuls of brushwood, which he cast upon the hearth and which blazed up merrily. Although it was but the beginning of autumn, a fire was needed to dry the wet clothing of the ladies; besides, the night was cool, and the wind whistled in through the cracks of the wainscotting in the uninhabited room.

Although their wandering life had accustomed the players to accommodations of the most varied description, they gazed with surprise upon this strange lodging, apparently long since given over to ghosts by men, and that awakened involuntarily thoughts of tragic stories; but, like well-bred people, they exhibited neither terror nor surprise.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

“I cannot give you more than plates and cutlery,” said the young Baron. “My pantry does not hold enough to afford supper to a mouse. I live alone in this place; I never have any guests, and you can see for yourselves, without being told, that this is not the abode of wealth.”

“That does not matter,” replied the Pedant; “for if on the stage we have to put up with chickens made of boards, and bottles turned in the solid wood, we are careful to provide more substantial viands for daily life. Hollow meats and imaginary wine would ill suit our stomachs, and in virtue of being the commissary of the company, I always have in reserve a Bayonne ham, a venison pasty, a loin of water-meadow veal, and a dozen bottles of Cahors or Bordeaux wine.”

“Well spoken, Pedant,” exclaimed the Leander. “Go and fetch the provender, and if his lordship will allow us and also deigns to sup with us, let us set the banquet-table right in this room. There is plenty of crockery in these sideboards, and the ladies can lay the covers."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The Baron, quite taken aback by the adventure, nodded in assent, whereupon the Isabella and the Donna Serafina, who were both seated by the fireplace, rose and set out the plates and dishes on the table, which Peter had already dusted and on which he had spread a well-worn but clean cloth.

The Pedant soon reappeared, carrying a basket in either hand, and triumphantly placed in the centre of the table a pasty fortress, with fair golden walls, the interior of which contained a garrison of beccaficos and partridges. He surrounded this gastronomical fort with six bottles, by way of outworks that would have to be carried before the place could be taken. A smoked ox-tongue and a piece of ham made everything symmetrical.

Beelzebub, having perched upon the top of one of the sideboards, was following the extraordinary preparations with interest and was endeavouring to appropriate, by smelling them at least, the many exquisite things outspread in such abundance. Its truffle-coloured nose breathed in deeply the perfumed emanations, its green eyes sparkled and rejoiced, and its chin was wet with the silvery saliva of desire. It would have dearly loved to draw near the table and to take a share of the Gargantua-like cheer, but that, apart from the hermit sobriety of the household, it was frightened by the sight of so many strange faces, so that its poltroonery struggled against its gormandism.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

The Swashbuckler, deeming the light of the lamp insufficient, had fetched from the chariot two stage candlesticks of wood covered with gilt paper and each provided with a number of candles, an addition that produced quite a splendid illumination. These candlesticks, in shape not unlike the seven-branched candlestick of Scripture, were usually placed upon the hymeneal altar, in the last scene of plays with scenery, or on the banquet-table, in Mairêt's "Mariamne" or Tristan's "Herodias."

Thanks to the blaze of these candles and of the burning brushwood, the dead room had regained an appearance of life. The pallid faces of the portraits were slightly flushed, and if perchance the virtuous dowagers, in their stiff collarettes and hoop-skirts, looked rather prim at the sight of the youthful actresses frolicking in the stern manor-house, the warriors and Knights of Malta, on the other hand, appeared to smile upon them from out their frames and to enjoy being present at the entertainment, save, however, two or three old graybeards who obstinately sulked under their yellow varnish, and preserved, in spite of all, the gruff expression given them by the painter.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

A warmer and brighter atmosphere filled the great hall, in which one usually breathed but the mouldy dampness of the grave. The dilapidated state of the tapestries and furniture became less patent and the pale spectre of poverty seemed to have left the castle for a brief season.

Sigognac, whom the surprise had pained at first, now allowed himself to be carried away by a novel sensation of comfort. His imagination was pleasantly stirred by the Isabella, Donna Serafina, and even by the maid, these women appearing to him more in the light of deities come down to earth than of mere mortals. As a matter of fact, they were three very pretty women, who would have made the pulses of far less innocent fellows than the young Baron beat fast. The whole thing seemed to him to be a dream, and he dreaded awaking from it.

He gave his hand to Donna Serafina, whom he seated on his right. Isabella sat down on his left, and the maid opposite; the duenna sat by the Pedant, while Leander and the Swashbuckler sat where they pleased. The young lord of the place was then enabled to study the faces of his guests at his leisure, for they were brilliantly lighted and stood out strongly. He first examined the ladies, of whom it may not be out of place to give a slight sketch while the Pedant is making a breach in the ramparts of the pasty.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

The Serafina was a young woman some twenty-four to twenty-five years of age, who, thanks to her having to play the parts of leading coquettes, had acquired the air of a woman of the world and the ways of a high-born lady. Her face, of a slightly marked oval, her somewhat aquiline nose, her prominent gray eyes, her red lips, the lower one divided by a line like Anne of Austria's, and looking like a cherry, combined to form an engaging and aristocratic mien further improved by the two masses of nut-brown hair that flowed in waves on either side her cheeks, which the excitement and the warmth flushed with rosy tints. Two long locks, called "mustaches," each bound with three bows of black ribbon, had capriciously separated from the crimped curls and brought out their vaporous grace in the same way as strong touches put on a painting at the last moment by an artist. Her felt hat, with its round brim and its feathers, one of which curled like a plume upon her shoulders, while the others were cockled up in puffs, formed a cavalier head-dress. A man's collar, trimmed with Alençon lace and fastened with a black bow, like the mustaches, spread out upon a green velvet dress with slashed sleeves, trimmed with aiguillettes and frogs, while the open front allowed the linen to puff out. A white silk scarf, worn saltire-wise, gave a gallant and dashing look to the costume.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

In this dress Serafina had the mien of a Penthesilea or a Marphisa, thoroughly suited to adventures and comedies of cloak and sword. It is true that the garments were not absolutely new, that wear had caused the velvet of the dress to become shiny in places, that the Frisian linen was somewhat rumpled, and that the lace would have looked rather yellow by daylight. On closer inspection the embroidery on the scarf was seen to be a bit rusty and told of pinchbeck; several of the aiguillettes had parted with their tips; the worn braiding of the frogs was full of loose ends in places; the drooping feathers flapped rather limply upon the brim of the felt hat; the lady's hair was somewhat out of curl, and a few bits of straw, picked up in the van, mingled their poverty with its opulence. But these minor blemishes did not prevent Donna Serafina from having the port of a queen deprived of her kingdom. If her dress was faded, her complexion was blooming, and for the matter of that, her attire struck the young Baron de Sigognac, quite unaccustomed to such splendour, as the most dazzling thing in the world, for he had hitherto seen only peasant women dressed in coarse stuff skirts and capes of calamanco, and, besides, he was too much taken with the beauty herself to pay any attention to the defects in her dress.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

The Isabella was younger than the Donna Serafina, as became her part — she played the ingénues. Nor did she carry so far the bravery of dress, limiting herself to an elegant and bourgeoise simplicity, as became the daughter of Cassandre. She had delicate, almost childish features, lovely silky brown hair, long lashes veiling her eyes, a small mouth the shape of Cupid's bow, and an air of maidenly modesty that was more natural than affected. A bodice of gray taffeta, trimmed with black velvet and jet, came down in a point over a skirt of the same colour; a slightly starched ruff rose behind her pretty neck, on which played some little stray curls, and round her neck she wore a string of imitation pearls. While at the first glance she attracted less attention than the Serafina, she retained it longer; she did not dazzle, but she charmed, which has an advantage of its own.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The Spanish expression, morena, applied to brunettes, could perfectly be applied to the soubrette, for her complexion was the golden tawny complexion of the gitana. Her thick, curly hair was raven black, and her yellowish brown eyes sparkled with diabolical mischievousness. Her wide, bright red lips parted now and then to show the gleam of white teeth that would have done honour to a wolf cub. For the rest, she was thin and burned up, as it were, with ardour and wit, but hers was that youthful, healthy thinness one likes to see. She must certainly have been as expert at receiving and passing on a love-letter off the boards as she was on them, but the woman who ventured to make use of this Dariolette had to be uncommonly sure of her own attractions. More than one love-epistle handed to her failed to be delivered, and the forgetful gallant dallied in the antechamber. She was one of those women whom their own sex consider ugly, but whom men cannot resist; they seem to be compounded of salt, pimento, and cantharides, which does not prevent their being cold as usurers when their interests are in question. Her dress consisted of a fanciful blue and yellow costume, with a cap of imitation lace.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

Dame Leonard, the heavy mother of the company, was dressed wholly in black, like a Spanish duenna. Her face, with its manifold chins, was framed in by a taminy coif; her complexion was wan, and worn by forty years' use of paint, while her unhealthy stoutness, due to age rather than good health, had given it the tone of yellow ivory and old wax. Her eyes, over which fell flabby lids, had an expression of low cunning, and formed a couple of black spots in her bloodless face. In spite of her carefully removing them with tweezers, a few hairs were beginning to shade the corners of her mouth. Feminine characteristics had almost disappeared from her face, the wrinkles of which could have told many a tale, had any one been curious enough to inquire. An actress since her childhood, Dame Leonard knew all about her profession, in which she had played every part in succession, up to and including that of duenna, always regretfully accepted by the coquetry of woman, who will not believe in the ravages of time. Dame

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Leonard had talent, and old though she was knew how to gain applause, even when side by side with young and pretty women, who were quite amazed to find it bestowed upon that old witch.

So much for the feminine part of the company. The chief comic parts were represented in it, and if a character was wanting some wandering actor or stage-struck amateur was taken in for the nonce, quite delighted to take a minor part and to have thus the opportunity of getting closer to the Isabellas and the Angelicas.

The male part was composed of the Pedant, already described, and of whom it is unnecessary to speak further, the Leander, the Scappino, the tragedy Tyrant, and the Swashbuckler or Hector.

The Leander, or first lover, whose business it was to make the most Hyrcanian tigresses more gentle than lambs, to fool the Truffaldini, to push aside the Ergastes and to pass triumphantly and superbly through the play, was a fellow of some thirty years who looked younger, thanks to the excessive care he took of his appearance. It is no small matter to represent, before female spectators, the lover, the mysterious and perfect being which each one of them fashions according to her own sweet will after the pattern of the "Amadis" or "Astrea." Therefore Master Leander nightly rubbed his face with spermaceti and powdered it with talc ; his eyebrows, the rebellious hairs in which he pulled out with tweezers, looked like a line drawn with Indian ink, and ended in fine points. His teeth, brushed to excess and rubbed with electuary, shone like Eastern pearls in his red gums, which he exhibited on every possible occasion, forgetful of the Greek proverb that says nothing is so foolish as a foolish laugh. His comrades affirmed that even when off the boards he rouged a little in order to make his eyes brighter. His carefully curled hair hung down his cheeks in shining spirals somewhat straightened out by the rain ; a fact he took advantage of to curl them again with his fingers, thus being enabled to show off a very white hand, on which sparkled a solitaire stone much too large to be genuine. His turn-down collar showed a round, white neck so closely shaven that no vestige of beard was visible. A quantity of fairly clean linen puffed out between the bottom of his jacket and his breeches, quilled with a wealth of ribbons, the care of which appeared to preoccupy him greatly. Even when looking at the wall, he seemed to be dying of love, and he could not call for wine without apparently fainting away. He punctuated his sentences with sighs, and, even when speaking on most indifferent matters, indulged in languishing looks, sentimental airs, and graces fit to kill one with laughing, but the ladies thought it all charming.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The Scappino had a foxy, cunning, satirical face; his eyebrows were of the shape of circumflex accents, his eyes restless and wide-awake, their yellow pupils quivering like a gold piece upon quicksilver; crow's-feet of sly wrinkles showed at each corner of his eyelids, full of lies, trickery, and deceit. His thin, flexible lips were constantly in motion, and smiling equivocally exhibited sharp teeth of rather ferocious aspect. When he took off his beretta, striped white and red, his closely cropped hair revealed the contours of a head with curious bumps. His hair was tawny and matted like a lion's and completed the air of noxious animal that marked his countenance. One felt tempted to look at the rascal's hand to see whether it was not blistered by the handling of the sweeps; for he looked quite as if he had spent some fifteen years of his life on the ocean engaged in writing his memoirs with a fifteen-foot pen. His falsetto voice, now high, now low, sounded with sudden changes of tone and queer squeaks, that startled and compelled laughter even if one did not feel like it. His motions were unexpected and apparently due to the sudden release of a concealed spring; there was something illogical and troublous about them, and they seemed to serve the purpose of holding the attention of the person addressed, rather than of expressing a thought or a sentiment. They were like the pantomime of a fox rapidly twisting and turning and indulging in innumerable tricks under a tree from the top of which a fascinated turkey is watching it before letting itself fall.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

He wore a gray smock-frock over his striped costume, either because he had not had time to change after the last performance, or because his scanty wardrobe did not include both a complete mufti and stage dress.

As for the Tyrant, he was a very kind-hearted fellow whom nature, no doubt jocularly inclined, had endowed with every external sign of ferocity. Never did a gentler soul dwell within a grimmer frame; heavy dark eyebrows, two fingers in width and as black as if of mole-skin, meeting over the nose, closely curling hair, thick beard up to the eyes, and kept uncut in order to avoid the trouble of wearing a false one when he played the part of Herod or Polyphontes, and a complexion the colour of Cordova leather, composed for him a mien as truculent and formidable as that painters love to bestow upon executioners and their assistants in the representations of the flaying alive of Saint Bartholomew and the beheading of Saint John the Baptist. A voice of thunder that made the panes rattle and the glasses dance on the table considerably helped to maintain the awe inspired by his ogre-like appearance, which was further set off by a black velvet doublet of most antique cut, so that he always won a success due to terror when he belowered the lines of Garnier or Scudéry. For the rest, he had a noble corporation and most satisfactorily filled the throne.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

As for the Hector, he was thin, pale, black, and dried up like a man hanged in summer; his skin looked like parchment clinging to bones; he had a huge nose, the shape of a bird-of-prey's beak, the thin edge of which shone like horn, and which rose up between the two halves of his shuttle-shaped face, made longer still by a pointed beard. His two profiles, stuck one against the other, found it very difficult to form a face between them, and his eyes had to turn up in Chinese fashion in order to find room in it. His half-shaven eyebrows curled up like black commas above his restless eyes; his mustaches, of amazing length, were waxed and pointed at each end by means of a cosmetic, and rose in a semicircle towards the heavens they sought to pierce; his ears, standing out from his head, were not at all unlike the two handles of a jug, and offered themselves to slaps and pinches. All these extravagant features, pertaining to caricature rather than to nature, seemed to have been carved by some mad fancy on the neck of a rebec, or to have been copied from some of the Pantagruelic monsters and chimeras that show at night on pastrycooks' lanterns. His hectoring grimaces had at last become his customary expression, and even when he left the theatre, he walked with long strides, his head thrown back, his fist on his hip, and one hand on the guard of his sword. The accoutrement of the fellow consisted of a yellow jerkin, bulging out like a cuirass, trimmed with green and slashed in Spanish fashion along the ribs, a starched ruff, supported by wire and cardboard, as vast as the Round Table, and on which the twelve Peers might have eaten their dinner, puffed trunk-hose fastened with points, white Russia-leather boots, in which his skinny legs waggled like flutes in their case when the piper takes them away, and a gigantic rapier which he never parted with, the open-work iron shell hilt of which must have weighed full fifty pounds. Over this costume he threw, for additional bravery, a blanket, the bottom of which was lifted by his rapier. Let me add, that I may omit nothing, that his gray felt hat, pulled out into the shape of a filter cone, was grotesquely adorned with a couple of cock's-feathers.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The meal was a silent one at first, for great appetites, like great loves, are wordless, but the pangs of hunger once appeased, every tongue was loosed. The young Baron, who probably had never had a full meal since the day he was weaned, ate, or gobbled up the food rather, with an ardour that would have prevented any one supposing that he had already supped, and this in spite of his earnest wish to appear love-lorn and romantic to the Serafina and the Isabella. The Pedant, who was amused by this juvenile appetite, piled up on Sigognac's plate partridge-wings and slices of ham that forthwith vanished like snowflakes falling upon a red-hot shovel. Beelzebub, carried away by gormandism, had made up its mind, notwithstanding its fears, to abandon the safe position it held on the cornice of the sideboard, having successfully reasoned out that it would be difficult for any one to pull its ears, since it had none, and that nobody could indulge at its expense in the coarse joke of tying a stewpan to its tail, in view of the fact that its lack of a tail forbade that sort of pleasantry, worthier of rascals than of well-bred people such as seemed to be those seated round the table, laden with food of unusual juiciness and perfume. It had therefore turned the darkness to account and had drawn near, crawling along the floor, and so completely flattened out that its elbows showed above its body, like a panther's watching a gazelle. Nobody had noticed it, and having reached the Baron de Sigognac's chair, it had stood up and, with the object of attracting its master's attention, performed a guitar air upon his knee with its claws. Sigognac, indulgent to the humble friend that had starved so long in his service, made it share his good fortune, and handed it under the table bones and bits of meat that Beelzebub received with frantic joy. Miraut also, having managed to enter into the banqueting-hall by following close on Peter's footsteps, came in for more than one good mouthful.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

The dead house seemed to have revived, filled as it was with light, warmth, and noise. The actresses, who had drunk a little wine, were chattering like parrots on a perch, and were exchanging compliments on their respective successes. The Pedant and the Tyrant were disputing about the relative superiority of the tragic and the comic poem; the one maintaining that it was more difficult to make well-bred people laugh than it was to frighten them by nursery tales of horror that had no other merit than that they were old; the other insisting that the scurrility and buffoonery comic writers made use of greatly lowered these authors. The Leander had drawn a small mirror from his pocket, and was gazing upon himself with as much satisfaction as Narcissus of old gazed upon his features in the brook. Contrary to custom, he was not in love with the Isabella; he aimed higher. He hoped, by his graces and his gentlemanly ways, to catch the eye of some inflammable dowager, whose four-horse coach would call for him after the performance and convey him to some mansion where the sensitive fair, in the most gallant of négligés, would be awaiting him ready to share a most delicious meal. Had the dream ever come true? Leander swore it had, but Scappino maintained it had not, and this gave rise to endless disputes between the pair. The wicked valet, as full of mischief as a monkey, affirmed that the poor wretch in vain ogled the ladies, cast killing glances at the boxes, laughed so as to show his complete set of teeth, turned out his leg, drew himself up, combed his wig and changed his linen for every performance, even at the cost of having to do without breakfast in order to pay the laundress' bill, — that he had not once yet succeeded in inspiring the least desire in the breast of any baroness, even of forty-five, with a face full of pimples and with plainly evident mustaches.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

THE CAR OF THESPIS

Scappino, observing Leander occupied with his dream, had cleverly brought up the question again, and the angry lady-killer offered to fetch out of his luggage a box filled with love-letters scented with musk and benzoin, and addressed to him by innumerable ladies of rank, countesses, marchionesses, and baronesses, every one madly in love with him; wherein the fop did not boast quite untruthfully, for the fad of intriguing with play-actors and performers was rather wide-spread at that period of relaxed morals. Serafina declared that had she happened to be one of these dames, she would have Leander thrashed for his impertinence and indiscreetness, while Isabella playfully threatened that if he did not show himself more modest, she would not marry him at the end of the play. Si-gognac, although a prey to the most distressing timidity, so that he could only stammer broken sentences, greatly admired the Isabella, and his eyes spoke more eloquently than his lips. The young girl had perceived the effect she was producing upon the Baron, and replied to his looks by languorous glances that drove the Hector to despair, for he was secretly in love with the beauty, though quite hopelessly so, in view of his grotesque part. A cleverer and bolder man than Sigognac would have pressed his advantage, but the poor Baron had had no opportunity to learn court manners in his ruinous mansion, and though he lacked neither wit nor culture, he showed for the time to very poor effect.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The ten bottles had been religiously emptied, and the Pedant overset the last, making the last drop shine on his thumb-nail. The Swashbuckler understood the meaning of the act, and went down to the court-yard to fetch additional bottles. The Baron, though already somewhat tipsy, could not refrain from draining a bumper to the health of the ladies, and that finished him.

The Pedant and the Tyrant drank like seasoned toppers who, if never entirely sober, are never, on the other hand, quite drunk. The Hector was sober after the Spanish fashion, and could easily have lived like the hidalgoes who make a dinner off three olives in their pockets and sup off an air on the mandolin. There was a reason for his frugality : he feared, if he ate and drank too freely, to lose the phenomenal leanness that had proved his most trusty comic resource. If he grew stout, his talent diminished, so that he lived only on condition of starving ; he was continually worried about himself, and he kept watching his belt in order to note whether, by any chance, he had grown bulkier since the night before. A voluntary Tantalus, an abstemious comedian, a martyr to leanness, a self-dissected anatomy, he merely trifled with his food, and had he applied his fasts to some pious purpose, would have been in Paradise along with Saints Anthony and Macarius.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

The duenna was gorging herself with both solids and liquids in amazing fashion, her flabby jowls and chins quivering as they were set in motion by a pair of jaws still well garnished with teeth. As for the Serafina and the Isabella, having no fans at hand, they were rivalling each other in yawning behind the diaphanous rampart of their pretty hands. Sigognac, though somewhat overcome by the fumes of the wine, perceived this and said to them : —

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“Ladies, I can see that though your good breeding leads you to struggle against slumber, you are desperately inclined to go to sleep. I wish I could offer each of you a properly tapestried room, with wide space on either side the bed and a dressing-room, but my poor house is falling in ruins, like my race, of which I am the last representative. I beg you will take my chamber, which is about the only one into which the rain does not penetrate. You will have to settle yourselves in it to the best of your ability, with Madam; the bed is roomy and the night will soon be past. These gentlemen will have to remain here and to make shift with the arm-chairs and chairs. Let me put you on your guard against being frightened by the flapping of the tapestry, the moaning of the wind in the chimney, and the scampering of the mice. I can assure you that, gloomy as the place is, it is not in the least haunted.”

“I play the part of Bradamante, and I am no coward,” said the Serafina laughingly. “I shall reassure the timid Isabella, and as for our duenna, she is a bit of a witch, and if the devil should turn up, she will be a match for him.”

Sigognac, taking up a light, showed the ladies to the bedroom, which did indeed impress them as being rather a weird place, for the flickering flame of the lamp, blown about by the draughts, caused strange shadows to undulate upon the beams of the ceiling, while monstrous shapes seemed to be crouching in the dark corners.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

“What a capital setting for the fifth act of a tragedy,” said the Serafina, casting a glance around her, while Isabella was unable to repress a shudder, due partly to the cold, partly to fear, as she felt herself caught in the dark and dank atmosphere.

The three ladies slipped, fully dressed, under the blankets, Isabella placing herself between the Serafina and the duenna, so that in the event of the hairy paw of a phantom or a succubus emerging from underneath the bed, it should first touch one of her companions. The two braver women soon fell asleep, but the timid young girl long kept her wide-open eyes upon the unused door, as though she felt that beyond it lay a whole world of ghosts and nocturnal horrors. The door, however, did not open; no spectre, clad in a shroud and clanking its chains, issued from it, although strange noises made themselves heard at times in the deserted chambers; and at last sleep filled timid Isabella’s eyes with its golden dust, and her regular breathing soon sounded along with the louder respiration of her companions.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The Pedant was sleeping soundly, his nose on the table, opposite the Tyrant, who was snoring like an organ-pipe and muttering, as he dreamed, fragmentary lines. The Swashbuckler, his head resting on the back of an arm-chair and his feet stretched out on the andirons, had wrapped himself up in his gray cloak, and looked like a herring done up in paper. Leander, in order not to spoil the curl of his hair, was sleeping stiffly with his head held up. Sigognac had settled himself in an arm-chair, but the events of the night had so overexcited him that he could not manage to doze.

It is impossible for two young women to suddenly break into a young man's life without upsetting it, especially when the young man has up to that time lived a dull, chaste, lonely life, and has been kept from all the pleasures of his age by that harsh stepmother called poverty.

It may be urged that it is quite improbable that a young fellow should have reached the age of twenty without having had a love affair, but Sigognac was proud and remained at home since he could not go forth in a style consonant with his rank and name. His relatives, whose assistance he might have asked for without humiliation, were dead; day by day he had sunk deeper into solitude and forgetfulness. He had, it is true, in the course of his solitary rambles, occasionally come across Yolande de Foix, mounted on her white palfrey and hunting the stag in company with her father and a number of young noblemen. The dazzling vision often recurred to him in his dreams; but what relations could there ever be between the beautiful and rich heiress and himself, a poor ruined country noble, lacking in this world's goods? Far from courting her notice, he had, whenever he met her, kept as far as possible in the background, not caring to excite laughter by the sight of his wretched, battered felt hat, his rat-eaten feathers, his worn and plainly too large garments, and his quiet nag, fitter to carry a village priest than a gentleman; for there is nothing so painful to a feeling heart as to appear ridiculous in the eyes of the beloved one. He had therefore recalled, in order to master his nascent passion, all the cold reasons inspired by poverty. But whether he had succeeded or not is what I cannot tell. He thought he had, at least, and had repelled the thought of love as being a mere chimera; he felt unhappy enough as it was, without adding to his pain the torments of a hopeless passion.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The night passed without other incident than the startling of Isabella by Beelzebub, that had curled itself up on her bosom, after the manner of Smarra, and refused to move, as it was very comfortable. As for Sigognac, he could not close his eyes, either because he was not used to sleeping out of his own bed or because the presence of the young women had upset his brain. I am rather of opinion that a vague plan was beginning to take shape in his brain and kept him wakeful and perplexed. The advent of the players seemed to him a stroke of fate, an embassy sent by Fortune to invite him to leave the feudal barracks in which he was wasting the years of his youth and pining away uselessly.

Day was breaking and gray morn, filtering in through the panes set in lead, made the yellow light of the dying lamps look livid and ghastly. The faces of the sleepers were strangely illumined by the double gleams, that divided them into two distinct halves, like mediæval surcoats. The Leander had acquired the tone of an old wax candle, and resembled the wax figures of Saint John the Baptist that are adorned with silk wigs, and from whose faces the rouge has fallen off in spite of the protection of the glass case. The Hector, his eyes carefully closed, his cheek-bones prominent, his maxillary muscles on the stretch, his nose as sharp as if it had been pinched by Death's lean fingers, looked like his own dead body. The Pedant's phiz was marked with brilliant red patches and apoplectic spots; the rubies on his nose had turned to amethysts, and the bluish bloom of wine stained his lips. A few drops of perspiration, rolling down through the ravines and counterscarps of his forehead, had been caught in the bushes of his gray eyebrows, and his flabby cheeks hung loosely. His face, which when awake and vivified by the mind, had a jovial look, was hideous when thus sunk in drunken sleep, and as he lay bending over the edge of the table, the Pedant looked like an old Ægipan overcome by debauch and tumbled into the side of a ditch after a bacchanalian orgy. The Tyrant with his colourless face and his black beard kept up pretty well; his face, half that of a kind-hearted Hercules and half that of a benignant executioner, could scarcely change.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

The maid also stood fairly well the indiscreet glimpses of day; she was not particularly dishevelled; only darker circles round her eyes and a few violet tones on her cheeks betokened fatigue due to a bad night's rest. A lascivious sunbeam, shooting past the empty bottles, the half-drained glasses, and the ravaged dishes, caressed the chin and lips of the girl like a faun teasing a sleeping nymph. The chaste dowagers on the greenery-yallery tapestry did their best to blush under their varnish at the sight of their solitude rudely disturbed by this gipsy encampment, and the banquet-hall had an air at once sinister and grotesque.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The maid was the first to wake to the kiss of morn; she rose, shook out her skirts in the way a bird shakes out its feathers, passed her hand over her hair to smooth it, and seeing that Baron de Sigognac was seated in his arm-chair, his eye as bright as a basilisk's, she went towards him and dropped him a pretty stage curtsy.

"I regret," said Sigognac, as he returned the maid's salutation, "that the ruinous condition of this place, better fitted to be a home for ghosts than for living beings, has prevented my entertaining you in a more suitable manner. I wish I could have had you resting between sheets of Holland linen and under a counterpane of Indian damask, instead of having to let you tire yourself out on that worm-eaten chair."

"There is no reason for regret, sir," replied the maid. "But for you we should have spent the night in our caravan stuck in a mud-hole, shivering in the driving rain, and the morning would have found us in a parlous state indeed. Besides, this place for which you profess contempt is a palace by the side of the draughty barns where, one and all, tyrants and victims, princes and princesses, Leanders and maids, we have perforce to sleep on trusses of hay in the course of our wandering players' life as we pass from town to town."

THE CAR OF THESPIS

While the Baron and the soubrette were engaged in this exchange of civilities, the Pedant rolled to the floor with a noise of breaking wood. His seat, unable longer to support his weight, had given way under him, and the corpulent old fellow, stretched out with his legs in the air, was kicking about like a turtle turned over on its back and uttering inarticulate cluckings. In falling he had instinctively caught at the table cloth, and thus caused a smash of crockery that poured over him. The noise awoke the whole company, and the Tyrant, after having stretched out his arms and rubbed his eyes, held out a helping hand to the poor old buffoon and set him up on his pins again.

"That sort of accident would never happen to our Hector," said the Herod, uttering a sort of deep-chested

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

grunt that stood him in the way of a laugh. "He could fall into a cobweb without injuring it."

"Quite true," replied the artist referred to, stretching out his long, spider-like limbs; "for every one is not so fortunate as to be a Polyphemus, a Cacus, a mass of flesh and blood like you, or a wine-sack, a walking hogshead like Blazius."

The noise had brought to their door the Isabella, the Serafina and the duenna. The two younger women, though somewhat fatigued and wan, were still charming when seen by daylight. Sigognac thought he had never seen anything so dazzling, notwithstanding the fact that a somewhat particular observer might have objected to certain details of their attire, the elegance of which had somewhat lost its freshness and newness; but what signify a few faded ribbons, a few breadths of stuff showing worn and shiny, a few defects and incongruities in dress, when the wearers of the costumes are young and pretty? Besides, the Baron's eyes, accustomed to the sight of old, dusty, faded, and ragged clothes, failed to note such trifles; the Serafina and the Isabella appeared to him to be dressed superbly, when he beheld them in the gloomy mansion where everything was decaying. As he looked at their graceful figures, he believed himself to be dreaming.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

The duenna enjoyed, in virtue of her age, the privilege of unchanging ugliness, and nothing could alter her wooden face, in which the features seemed to be carved, and in which shone a couple of owl-like eyes. Sunlight or candle-light made no difference to her.

At this moment Peter entered to put the room in order, to replenish the fire, in which a few smouldering sticks of wood were disappearing under a layer of ashes, and to clear away the remains of the meal, so repugnant once hunger has been satisfied.

The fire shining on the hearth, and licking a backplate bearing the arms of the Sigognacs, little accustomed to such caresses, collected the whole company round the hearth and lighted it up with its brilliant gleams. A brightly burning fire is always pleasant after a night that, if not sleepless, has not been one of sound sleep, and the discomfort exhibited on every face in the form of grimaces or more or less plain marks, vanished utterly, thanks to this beneficent influence. Isabella held out to the flame the palms of her little hands, flushed with rose, and her face illumined by the glow lost its pallor. Donna Serafina, taller and more robust, stood behind her like an elder sister who, being less fatigued, allows her junior to sit down. As for the Swashbuckler, perched on one of his heron-like legs, he was dreaming half-awake like a water-bird on the edge of a pool, its beak in its ruff and one foot drawn up under its body. Blazius, the Pedant, was licking his lips and examining one bottle after another to ascertain whether it held perchance a drop of liquor.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The young Baron had drawn Peter aside to find out whether it might be possible to obtain in the village a few dozen eggs or some chickens to be killed for the company's breakfast, and Peter had hastened off to execute the commission, the players having expressed their intention of making an early start in order to make a long stage of it and to reach their sleeping-place before it became late.

"I am much afraid that you will have but a poor breakfast," said Sigognac to his guests, "and you will have to put up with Pythagorean fare. Yet a poor breakfast is better than none, and there is not a single tavern or pot-house within twenty miles. You can see from the condition of the castle that I am not rich, but as my poverty is due to my ancestors having spent their means in fighting for the King, I have no reason to blush for it."

THE CAR OF THESPIS

"No, indeed, sir," returned the Herod in his base voice; "many a man who boasts of his wealth would care little to say how he came by it. Contractors may dress in cloth of gold, while noblemen have cloaks full of holes, but honour shows through the rags."

"What I am surprised at," said Blazius, "is that an accomplished gentleman, such as you appear to be, sir, should be content to waste his youth in a retreat where fortune cannot find him, however desirous it may be of doing so. If it did happen to pass by this castle, which may have been a very fine building two hundred years ago, it would proceed on its way, believing the place to be uninhabited. You ought to go to Paris, sir, the eye and centre of the world, the meeting-place of wits and brave men, the Eldorado and land of Canaan of French Spaniards and of Christian Hebrews, the blessed country illumined by the rays of the sun of the Court. There you would not fail to have your merits recognised and to make your way, either by attaching yourself to some great noble or by performing some distinguished action, an opportunity for which would speedily present itself."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The old man's words, in spite of their farrago and the burlesque form in which they were couched,— involuntary reminiscences of the parts of pedants he was accustomed to play, —did not lack sense. Sigognac felt this, and indeed, in the course of his long rambles across the barrens, he had often said to himself what Blazius had just given expression to.

But he had not the means to undertake so long a trip, and he knew not where to turn to obtain them. He was proud as well as brave, and feared a smile more than a sword-thrust. Without being familiar with fashions, he felt that he looked ridiculous in his outworn garments, that had been old-fashioned years before, and like those whom poverty makes timid, he did not take into account his personal advantages, and looked upon his condition from the unpleasant side only. Possibly he might have obtained some assistance from the former friends of his father by merely cultivating them a little, but such an effort was beyond his powers, and he would rather have starved to death, seated on a chest by the side of his coat of arms and chewing a tooth-pick like a Spanish don, than have asked for aid or a loan. He was one of those men who, when invited to partake of an excellent meal, pretend, though starving, to have dined rather than be suspected of being hungry.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

“I have often thought of doing so, but I have no friends in Paris, and the descendants of those who knew my family when it was rich and its members filled offices at Court, would scarcely welcome a wan and lean Sigognac swooping down upon them with beak and talons to secure his share of the spoil. Besides, — I do not see why I should be ashamed to say it, — I have no equipage, and I could not present myself on a footing worthy of my name. I do not believe that even if I put together all that I have and whatever Peter may possess, I could manage to reach Paris.”

“But you are not bound to enter the great city in triumph, like a Roman Cæsar on a car drawn by four white steeds,” answered Blazius. “If our lowly ox-cart is not repugnant to your lordship’s pride, come to Paris with us, since we are bound thither. Many a man now occupying an exalted station has entered the capital on foot, carrying his bundle at the end of his rapier and his shoes in his hand for fear of wearing them out.”

Sigognac blushed, half from shame, half from desire. On the one hand his pride of race revolted at the thought of being under an obligation to a poor strolling player, but, on the other, his natural kindness of heart was touched by an offer made so cordially and which gratified his secret wishes. He feared, besides, to wound the actor's self-love by a refusal, and perhaps to miss an opportunity that might not occur again. No doubt there was something shocking in the thought of the descendant of the Sigognacs travelling on the car of Thespiæ pell-mell with nomadic players, that would certainly cause the unicorns and the lions, langued gules, on his coat of arms to neigh and roar, but after all the young Baron had starved himself long enough within his feudal mansion.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

He wavered and hesitated to say "yes" or "no," weighing the two decisive monosyllables in the scales of reflection, when Isabella, approaching him with a gracious air, and standing before the Baron and Blazius, spoke the following words, that put an end to the young man's hesitation: —

"Our poet, having come in for a legacy, has left us, and you might take his place, sir, for I unwittingly found, on opening a copy of Ronsard lying on the table by your bed, a sonnet with many corrections that you must surely have written. You could arrange our parts, make the necessary cuts and additions, and, at need, write a piece on a subject suggested to you. It so happens that I have an Italian plot in which there would be a very pretty part for me, if any one would work it up."

THE CAR OF THESPIS

As she said this, Isabella cast upon the Baron a glance that was so sweet and so penetrating that he could not resist it. Peter's arrival, with a huge omelet and a fairly large ham, broke up the conversation. The whole company sat down to table and fell to with a good appetite. Sigognac himself merely tasted, out of politeness, of the viands placed before him, for his usual temperate habits did not fit in with meals so close to each other; and besides, his mind was filled with other matters.

The breakfast over, and while the ox-driver was twisting the yoke-thongs round the horns of the oxen, Isabella and Serafina expressed a wish to visit the garden which they could see from the court-yard.

"I am afraid," said Sigognac as he offered them his hand to aid them to descend the disjoined, moss-covered steps, "that you may leave pieces of your gowns on the brambles; for though the proverb says there is no rose without a thorn, there are, on the other hand, many thorns without roses."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The young Baron had uttered these words in the tone of melancholy and irony customary with him when he alluded to his poverty, but, as if the depreciated garden had piqued itself on its capabilities, two little wild roses, their five petals partially opened round their yellow pistils, unexpectedly shone upon a projecting branch that barred the way of the young ladies. Sigognac picked the roses and gallantly offered them to Isabella and Serafina, saying: —

“I did not think my flower beds had so much bloom about them. It is weeds only that grow here, and the only nosegays we can pick are made up of nettles and hemlock. It is your presence that has caused these two flowers to blossom here, like a smile upon a sorrowful face, putting a touch of poetry upon the ruins.”

Isabella carefully fastened the eglantine blossom in the bosom of her dress, and cast upon the young man a long glance of thanks that testified to the value the humble gift possessed in her eyes. Serafina, biting the stem of her flower, kept it between her lips, as if to contrast their ruby colour with the pale rose flush of the blossom.

In this way they proceeded as far as the mythological statue which showed at the end of the walk, Sigognac holding aside the branches that might have swished in the ladies' faces as they passed along. The younger girl gazed with tender interest at the uncultivated garden which was so thoroughly in harmony with the ruinous castle. She thought of the sad hours Sigognac must have spent in that home of dullness, poverty and solitude, his brow pressed against the window-pane, his eyes fixed upon the deserted road, with no other company than a black cat and a white dog. Serafina's harder features expressed only cold contempt concealed by politeness; in her opinion, the young nobleman was altogether too unkempt, even though she did entertain a certain amount of respect for persons of title.

THE CAR OF THESPIA

"Here end my domains," said the Baron on reaching the rock-work niche in which the statue of Pomona was mouldering away. "Formerly the hills and the plains, the fields and the moors, as far as the eye can reach, belonged to my ancestors; now I have just enough left to enable me to await the time when the last of the Sigognacs shall join his forefathers in the family vault, our only possession."

"It is very early in the day for you to be so gloomy," said Isabella, touched by the reflection, which had occurred to her also, but assuming a playful air in order to dispel the cloud of sadness that had gathered on Sigognac's brow. "Fortune is a woman, and though said to be blind, she does sometimes from the top of her wheel distinguish in the crowd a man of rank and merit; all one has to do is to put one's self in her way. Come, make up your mind to accompany us, and in a few years, perhaps, the towers of Sigognac, roofed with new slates, restored and whitewashed, will look as proud as they now look pitiful; besides," she added in a low voice, so as not to be heard by Serafina, "it would really pain me to leave you behind in this owl's-nest."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The sweet light that shone in Isabella's eyes overcame the Baron's repugnance. The attraction of a love-affair made up, in his view, for the possible humiliation involved in a trip undertaken under such conditions. There was no loss of rank attached to the following of an actress for love's sake, to the accompanying a players' van in the character of a suitor, for the most accomplished cavalier would not hesitate to do so. The quiver-bearing god is fond of compelling gods and heroes to do the strangest things and to assume the most extraordinary disguises; Jupiter put on the shape of a bull in order to seduce Europa; Hercules spun at the feet of Omphale; the wise Aristotle went on all-fours, carrying his mistress on his back because she wanted to ride on philosopherback (a curious kind of mount!); every one of these performances being contrary to divine and to human dignity. But was Sigognac in love with Isabella? He himself did not attempt to fathom the riddle; he only felt that it would be horribly dull for him to remain in the castle that had been enlivened for a moment by the presence of a young and lovely girl.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

Consequently he soon made up his mind, and begging the players to wait a moment for him, he drew Peter aside and confided his purpose to him. Although the faithful servant suffered at the thought of parting with his master, he clearly perceived the disadvantages of a longer stay in Sigognac. He had watched with sorrow the young man's youth wasting away in gloomy idleness and indolent sadness, and while a company of strolling players struck him as being an inappropriate escort for a lord of Sigognac, he nevertheless preferred this mode of trying his luck to the deep atony that for two or three years past more particularly had mastered the young Baron. It did not take him long to fill a valise with the few belongings of his master, and to put into a leather purse the scanty pistoles scattered in the drawers of the old cupboard, to which he took care to add, without saying a word about it, his own poor savings, a piece of devotion which the Baron possibly did not notice. In addition to the various offices filled by him in the castle, Peter had also to discharge the functions of treasurer, a perfect sinecure.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The white nag was saddled, for Sigognac proposed to ride in the players' van only when some six or eight miles from the castle, to conceal his departure. In that way, he would look as if he were accompanying his guests on their road. Peter was to follow on foot and bring the animal back to the stable.

The oxen were harnessed and were trying, in spite of the heavy yoke that weighed down their heads, to raise their wet black noses, from which dropped filaments of silvery saliva. The sort of red and yellow esparto tiaras that crowned their heads, and the white linen rugs that were wrapped round them like shirts, in order to protect them from the attacks of flies, gave them a most majestic and Mithra-like look. Standing in front of them, the driver, a tall young fellow, as tanned and shy as a shepherd of the Roman Campagna, leaned upon the pole of his goad in an attitude that recalled, unwittingly no doubt, that of Greek heroes on antique bassi-relievi. Isabella and Serafina had taken their seats on the front of the chariot in order to enjoy the prospect; the duenna, the Pedant, and the Leander were at the back, more desirous of indulging in another sleep than of viewing the moor landscape. Everybody was ready; the driver touched up the oxen; the animals bent their heads, strained on their bow-legs, and started; the chariot got under way, the woodwork plained, the insufficiently greased axles creaked, and the vault of the porch echoed the heavy tread of the team. They were off.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

During the course of these preparations Beelzebub and Miraut, grasping the fact that something unusual was going on, kept coming and going with an air of surprise and anxiety, racking their imperfect animal brains in search of the explanation of the presence of so many people in a usually deserted place. The dog trotted aimlessly from Peter to his master with eager, questioning glance, and growled at the strangers. The cat, more reflective, cautiously smelt the wheels, examined the oxen from a safer distance, their bulk impressing it greatly, and prudently springing backwards when they unexpectedly turned their horns in its direction. Then it would sit down in front of the old white nag, with which it was on confidential footing, and seemed to ask it questions. The good old steed bent its head down towards the cat, that put up its own, and as it wrinkled back its gray lips, on which bristled some long hairs, for the purpose, no doubt, of chewing a bit of fodder caught between its teeth, it really looked as though it were conversing with its feline friend. What was the nature of the communication? Democritus, who claimed to translate the speech of animals, alone could have understood it. However it may be, the fact remains that after this wordless talk, the gist of which was conveyed by Beelzebub to Miraut in a number of winks and a few plaintive cries, the cat seemed to have got at the meaning of the commotion. When the Baron had mounted and had picked up the reins, Miraut placed himself on the right and Beelzebub on the left of the nag, and the lord of Sigognac left his ancestral home between his dog and his cat. It was plain that before venturing forth in a way so unusual in its species the prudent cat had guessed its master had come to some momentous decision.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

On the point of leaving his gloomy home, Sigognac

THE CAR OF THESPIS

felt himself filled with sorrow. He cast another long look upon the walls black with mildew and green with moss, every stone of which he knew ; upon the towers with their rusty vanes that he had so often gazed upon during long weary hours with a fixed, inattentive stare ; at the windows of the desolate chambers he had so often traversed as though he were a spectre haunting an accursed castle, and almost afraid of the sound of his own footsteps ; at the waste garden in which toads hopped about on the damp ground and adders glided between the brambles ; at the chapel with its fallen-in roof and crumbling arches, the rubbish covering the lichen-coated tombstones under which slept side by side his father and his mother, the latter a gracious image, dim as the remembrance of a dream, that he had scarcely caught a glimpse of in his earliest childhood. He thought also of the portraits in the gallery which had kept him company in his solitude and smiled upon him for twenty years with their fixed smiles ; of the duck-hunter on the tapestry ; of his four-poster bed, the pillow of which he had so often wetted with his tears. And all those things, old and mean, dull and grim, dusty and drowsy, that had filled him with such intense loathing and weariness, now appeared to him endowed with a charm he had failed to perceive. He considered himself ungrateful towards the poor old dismantled home that, after all, had sheltered him to the best of its ability, and that had persisted, in spite of its age, in keeping up in order that it should not crush him in its fall, like some octogenarian servant that remains standing on his shaky legs so long as the master is there. Many a bitter sweetness, many a sad pleasure, many a happy sorrow came crowding back into his mind; habit, life's pale, slow-footed companion, seated on the well-known threshold, turned upon him its eyes filled with hopeless tenderness as it repeated a refrain of his childhood, a refrain of the nursery, in an irresistibly low voice, and as he crossed the porch it seemed to him that an invisible hand was plucking at his cloak to make him turn back.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

When he emerged from the gate, riding on ahead of the chariot, a gust of wind wafted to him the fresh scent of the heather washed by the rain, the sweet and penetrating aroma of the native land. A distant bell was tinkling, and its silvery vibrations were brought to him on the wings of the same breeze that was conveying the scent of the moors. It was too much for him, and Sigognac, seized with profound home-sickness though he was but a few yards from his dwelling, made a movement to turn back; the old nag was already turning its head in the direction indicated, with more alertness than seemed compatible with its years; Miraut and Beelzebub simultaneously looked up, as if aware of what was passing in their master's mind, and staying their steps fixed upon him questioning eyes. But the half-turn resulted in a very different way from what might have been expected, for it caused Sigognac's glance to meet that of Isabella, and the young girl's was full of such caressing languor and of so plain though mute a prayer that the Baron felt himself turn pale and red in turns; he completely forgot the creviced walls of his manor, the scent of the heather, the tinkling of the bell, that nevertheless kept up its sorrowful call, abruptly slapped his horse with the bridle, and drove it on with a vigorous pressure of the leg. The struggle was over: Isabella had conquered.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

The chariot followed the road I spoke of at the outset of this tale, driving the terrified frogs from out the ruts filled with the rain. When the main road was reached and the oxen were enabled to draw the lumbering vehicle to which they were harnessed at a better pace upon dryer ground, Sigognac dropped back from the van to the rear-guard, not wishing to exhibit too much attention towards Isabella, and also, perhaps, in order to indulge more freely the thoughts that filled his mind.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The pepper-pot turrets of Sigognac were already half-hidden behind the clumps of trees ; the Baron rose in his stirrups to have a last look at them, and as he glanced down on the ground, he saw Miraut and Beelzebub, whose doleful countenances expressed the greatest grief that can be read on animals' faces. Miraut, profiting by the stop involved in the contemplation of the towers of the old home braced his stiffened muscles and tried to leap up to his master's face in order to lick it a last time. Sigognac, guessing at the poor beast's intention, seized it, just below his boot-top, by the too loose scruff of the neck, dragged it up to the pommel of the saddle, and kissed its nose, black and rough like a truffle, without any attempt to avoid the wet caress with which the grateful animal covered his mustache. While this was going on, Beelzebub, more agile and aiding itself with its still sharp claws, had escalated on the other side Sigognac's boot and thigh, and showing its crop-eared black head on the level of the holsters was purring in formidable fashion and rolling its great yellow eyes. It also was begging for a gesture of farewell. The young Baron stroked the cat's head two or three times, as it arched its back and cuddled close to enjoy the more the loving touch. I hope my readers will not laugh at my hero, when I tell them that the humble proofs of affection of these creatures, that have no souls but are full of feeling, filled him with deep emotion, and that two tears, coming from his heart with a sob, fell upon the heads of Miraut and Beelzebub, baptising them friends of their master, in the human sense of the word.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

The two animals followed Sigognac for a time with their eyes; he had trotted off to rejoin the chariot; and when they had lost sight of him where the road curved they fraternally returned to the mansion.

The storm of the previous night had not left upon the sandy soil of the moors the traces that denote abundant rain in less sterile districts; the landscape, that had been merely refreshed, had a sort of rustic beauty. The heather, cleansed of its dusty covering by the rain, carpeted the slopes on either side the road with clumps of violet blossoms; the reeds, green once more, waved their golden blooms; the water plants spread out on the refilled pools; the pines themselves shook their sombre foliage in less funereal fashion and gave out a balsamic scent; wisps of blue smoke rising gaily from a clump of chestnut trees indicated the home of a farmer, while on the rolling downs stretching as far as the eye could reach the scattered sheep looked like spots as they grazed under the guard of a shepherd dreaming away on top of his stilts. On the verge of the horizon the distant summits of the Pyrenees, half-blurred by the haze of an autumn morning, showed like archipelagoes of white clouds shaded with azure.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

At times the road sank between two banks, the fallen slopes of which were of sand white as ground sandstone, while on their crests grew thick shrubs and tangled plants that swished against the hood of the passing chariot. In some places the ground was so soft that it had been necessary to strengthen the roadway by putting down cross pine-trunks, that gave rise to bumps and jolts which caused the actresses to shriek loudly. In other places they had to cross shaky culverts over pools of stagnant water or brooks that cut the road. At every dangerous place Sigognac helped Isabella, more timid or less lazy than Serafina and the duenna, to descend from the van. As for the Tyrant and Blazius, they were sleeping soundly, jolted between the boxes, after the fashion of men who had been through a good deal worse than this. The Hector was walking by the side of the chariot in order to preserve, by this exercise, his phenomenal leanness, of which he was most careful. Seen from afar lifting up his long legs, he would have been taken for a field spider walking through the corn. He made such long strides that he often had to stop and await the rest of the company ; for having acquired in the performance of his parts the habit of swinging the hips forward and stalking on like a pair of compasses, he could not get rid of that gait, whether he were in town or in the country, and invariably strode along.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

Ox-carts do not progress very rapidly, especially on the moors, where the wheels occasionally sink into the sand up to the axles, and where the road can be distinguished from the surrounding wastes only by ruts a foot or two deep. Therefore, although the stout cattle, bending their muscular necks, were bravely hauling in obedience to the driver's goad, they had not gone more than six miles ere the sun was already high in the heavens. It is true that these were local miles, as long as a day of starvation, and very much like the miles that, after the first fortnight, must have marked the love rests of the couples charged by Pantagrue! to set up milestones in his fair realm of Mirebalais. The peasants met on the way, carrying a bundle of grass or of sticks, were becoming less numerous, and the moor spread out in its desert bareness as wild as a Spanish despoblado or a South American pampa. Sigognac, considering there was no use in tiring out his old nag, alighted, and threw the reins to the old servant, whose face, in spite of many a layer of sunburn, was visibly pale from deep emotion. The moment of parting had come for master and man; a painful moment, for Peter had seen Sigognac born, and he was the Baron's humble friend rather than his servant.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

"God be with your lordship," said Peter, bending over the hand the Baron held out to him, "and may He restore the fortunes of the Sigognacs. I am sorry that He has not willed that I should accompany your lordship."

"What could I have done with you, my poor Peter, in the new life I am entering upon? My means are so small that I really could not throw upon fate the burden of looking after two of us. In the castle you will always manage to get along somehow; our former farmers will not allow their master's faithful friend to starve. Besides, the old home of the Sigognacs must not be wholly deserted and handed over to owls and serpents as though it were a hovel visited by Death and haunted by ghosts. The soul of the old home lives still in me, and as long as I live there shall be at its gate a porter to prevent the children from practising with their slings at our coat of arms as a target."

THE CAR OF THESPIS

The servant nodded assent, for, like all old domestics of noble families, he worshipped the manor house, and Sigognac, in spite of its crevices, its state of disrepair, and its wretchedness, seemed to him still one of the finest residences in the world.

"And then," added the Baron with a smile, "who would take care of Bayard, Miraut, and Beelzebub?"

"That is true, master," answered Peter, as he took Bayard's bridle, while Sigognac was patting its neck by way of caress and farewell.

On parting from its master the good steed neighed repeatedly, and Sigognac long heard, fainter as the distance grew, the loving call of the grateful animal.

Left alone, he experienced the feeling people have when they have taken ship, and their friends have left them at the end of the jetty. That is perhaps the saddest moment of the departure; the world one has been living in is being left behind and one hastens to join the other travellers, so lonely and sad does one feel, and so urgently do the eyes call for a human face to look upon. Sigognac therefore quickened his steps to catch up the chariot that rolled heavily along, the sand creaking as the wheels furrowed it.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

On seeing Sigognac walking by the van, Isabella complained of being uncomfortable in her seat, and asked to be allowed to get down, in order to stretch her limbs, she said, but in reality with the kindly intention of not leaving the young nobleman a prey to his melancholy thoughts and to distract him by her gay chatter.

The veil of sadness that covered Sigognac's face was dispelled as a sunbeam dispels a cloud, when the young girl asked for the support of his arm to walk for a little distance on the road that here happened to be smooth.

They were walking thus side by side, Isabella reciting some passages from one of her parts that she was not quite satisfied with and that she desired him to alter, when the blast of a horn suddenly sounded on the right of the road in a coppice. The branches parted before the chests of the horses, and young Yolande de Foix burst into the middle of the road in all the splendour of a huntswoman. The excitement of the chase had mantled her cheeks with a deeper red, her breath came quick, and her bosom rose and fell faster under the velvet and gold of her bodice. A few tears in her long skirt, a few scratches on the flanks of her horse proved that the intrepid Amazon feared neither copse nor thicket, and although the noble steed's ardour did not require to be excited, and its veins, filled with generous blood, stood out like whipcord upon its white, foam-flecked neck, she was touching it up with a whip, the pommel of which was formed of an amethyst engraved with her arms. The horse was curveting and prancing, to the great admiration of three or four richly dressed and splendidly mounted young noblemen, who applauded the grace and boldness of the new Bradamante.

THE CAR OF THESPIS

"Pray look," she said to the three swains who galloped by her side, "pray look at Baron de Sigognac escorting a gipsy!"

And the group passed on in a cloud of dust with a burst of laughter. Sigognac flushed with anger and shame, and quickly put his hand on the hilt of his sword; but he was on foot, and it would have been madness to run after people on horseback, to say nothing of the fact that he could not call out Yolande. A tender, submissive glance from the actress soon made him forget the insolent look of the noble lady.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The day passed without further incident, and at about four in the afternoon the party reached the place where they were to dine and sleep.

At Sigognac the evening proved gloomy; the portraits looked grimmer and more sullen even than usual, impossible though it seemed; the stairs sounded more sonorously and more emptily; the rooms appeared to have grown larger and barer; in the long passages the wind moaned weirdly, and the spiders, restless and anxious, came down from the ceilings spinning long threads; the crevices in the wall yawned wide like jaws distended by weariness. The ruinous old house seemed to know its young master had gone, and to mourn over his departure.

Under the mantel of the chimney Peter was sharing his scanty meal with Miraut and Beelzebub, by the smoky light of a resin torch, and in the stable Bayard could be heard pulling at his chain and biting at his crib.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

III

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

THE place where the tired oxen stopped of themselves, shaking with an air of satisfaction the long filaments of saliva hanging from their moist muzzles, was a wretched collection of huts that in any place less wild would not have been dignified with the name of hamlet even. It consisted of five or six shanties scattered under fairly large trees, the growth of which had been favoured by the presence of a little loam, increased by manure and detritus of all sorts. The cabins, constructed of clay, small stones, roughly dressed logs or boards, and covered with big thatched roofs, brown and mossy, that reached almost to the ground, and the sheds attached to them, in which lay a few agricultural implements the worse for wear and soiled with rust, looked fitter to be the abodes of unclean animals than of creatures made in the image of God; and, in point of fact, a number of black pigs shared them with their owners without exhibiting the least disgust, a proof of a lack of delicacy in these domestic wild boars.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

In front of the doors stood a few pot-bellied, thin-limbed, feverish-looking children, wearing shirts too short in front or behind, or even a mere waist-band laced with string, their condition of nudity embarrassing them as little, apparently, as though they had been inhabiting the Garden of Eden. Their eyes, ablaze with curiosity, shone through their bushy, unkempt locks like the eyes of night-birds through foliage. Fear and desire contended with each other in the expression on their faces; they felt like running behind a hedge to hide, but they were fascinated and compelled to remain where they were by the sight of the chariot and its occupants.

Somewhat farther back, on the threshold of her cabin, a thin woman, with wan complexion and sunken eyes, cradled in her arms a starving babe, that kneaded with its little hand, already tanned, a bosom whence milk had ceased to flow, and the somewhat whiter tint of which indicated that the poor wretch, degraded by poverty, was still quite a young woman. She looked at the players with a dull, brutish stare, seemingly incapable of realising what it was she beheld. Crouching by the side of her daughter, the grandmother, more bent and wrinkled than Hecuba, the spouse of Priam, King of Ilion, was dreaming away, her chin between her knees and her hands clasped round her legs, in the attitude of some ancient Egyptian idol. The prominent knuckles, the network of salient veins, and the muscles, tautened like the strings of a guitar, made these poor hands of hers resemble an anatomical preparation forgotten in bygone times in a cupboard by a careless surgeon. Her arms were mere sticks on which hung parchment-like skin, with, at the joints, transverse wrinkles like cuts made by a chopper. On her chin bristled long tufts of hair ; a gray moss filled her ears ; her eyebrows, like wall-plants in front of a grotto, hung before the cavernous orbits in which slumbered eyes half veiled by the flabby pellicules of the lids. As for her mouth, it had been swallowed up by the gums, and its place was marked only by a star of concentric wrinkles.

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

On beholding this ancient scarecrow, the Pedant, who was walking, exclaimed : —

“ Oh, what a horrible, disastrous, and damnable old witch ! By comparison with her the Fates are spruce and comely ; she is so sunk in senility, obsolescence, and mildew that no fountain of youth could renew hers. She must be the very Mother of Eternity in person.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

When she was born, if ever she came thus into the world, — for her nativity must have preceded creation, — Time was already white-bearded. Would that Master Alcofribas Nasier had beheld her ere he drew the picture of his Sybil of Panzoust or his beldame fanned by a lion with a fox's tail! Then would he have known how many wrinkles, crevices, furrows, ditches, and counterscarps a human ruin can contain, and given us a masterly description of them. No doubt this hag was beautiful in her youth, for it is the prettiest maidens who turn into the most repulsive of old women. Take the hint, young ladies," continued Blazius, turning to the Isabella and the Serafina who had drawn near to listen to him. "When I reflect that a mere three-score years falling upon your springtime bloom would turn you into as hideous, abominable, and appalling old horrors as this mummy broken forth from its case, I really feel grieved to the heart, and it makes me love my own ugly mug the more, since it can in no wise be thus transmuted into a tragical larva, its ugliness, on the contrary, being comically improved by the lapse of years."

Young women do not like being shown themselves, even in the most distant future, becoming old and ugly, which is one and the same thing, so the two actresses turned their backs on the Pedant with a disdainful little shrug of the shoulders, like women used to such impertinence from him. Approaching the chariot, from which the trunks were being unloaded, they appeared to give themselves over to the duty of seeing that their property was not harmed; the truth is they could find nothing to reply to the Pedant, for Blazius, by himself making fun of his own lack of comeliness, had destroyed all chance of a retort. This was a trick he often made use of in order to make others smart without being made to suffer himself.

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

The dwelling in front of which the oxen had stopped, with the instinct of animals that never forget a place where they have found both food and litter, was one of the largest in the place. It stood with a certain air of assurance upon the side of the road, from which the other cabins withdrew, ashamed of their uncared-for condition, and concealing their nudity behind a clump or two of bushes, like unfortunate, ungainly girls surprised while bathing. Conscious of being the finest house in the place, the inn seemed to court attention, and its sign stuck out across the road as though to stop travellers on foot or on horseback.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

This sign, projected beyond the façade by means of a sort of iron gallows which, at a pinch, could have served for the hanging of a man, consisted of a rusty plate of sheet-iron that creaked upon its bar whenever any breeze blew. A chance dauber had painted upon it the orb of day, not with its golden face and locks, but with a blue disk and blue rays, after the fashion of the sun shadows, with which coats of arms are occasionally diapered. Why had "The Blue Sun" been chosen as the ensign of this hostelry? There are so many Golden Suns on the high-roads that one ceases to distinguish one from another, and, besides, a slight eccentricity is not undesirable in an inn sign. Yet, plausible as it looks, that was not the real motive; the painter who had worked up the image had blue only left, and he would have had to make a trip to some large town in order to procure other colours. He therefore proclaimed the superiority of blue over all other colours and used this celestial shade to paint blue lions, blue horses, and blue cocks upon the signs of the various inns, — a performance that would have won him praise in China, where the more unlike nature a painting is, the more it is praised.

The Inn of the Blue Sun was roofed with tiles,

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

some brown, some of a red-gold shade that betokened recent repairs, and furnished a guarantee that the rooms were rain-proof at least. The façade towards the road was rough-cast with lime, so that the cracks in the wall and the deterioration of the front were concealed, and the building acquired a certain air of cleanliness. The joists of the timber-work, arranged in the form of saltire crosses and of lozenges, were set off by a coat of red paint after the Basque fashion. It had been deemed unnecessary to indulge in such luxury upon the other sides, and the earthy tones of the clay showed out crude and plain. Less rough or not so poor as the other inhabitants of the hamlet, the owner of the inn had conceded something to the refinements of civilisation: the sashes of the best room were glazed, a rare thing at that time and in that part of the country; the other sashes were filled in with canvas or oiled paper, stretched on frames, or were closed by shutters painted the same sang-de-bœuf red as the timbering on the façade.

A shed attached to the house provided sufficient shelter for the vehicles and the animals. Quantities of hay projected through the bars of the racks as through the teeth of a huge comb, while long troughs, hollowed out of old pine logs mounted on four legs, held the least fetid water obtainable from the near-by pools.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Master Chirriguirri was therefore justified in claiming that there was not another inn within thirty miles with such commodious buildings, so well stocked with provender and victuals, so full of blazing fires, so rich in soft and comfortable beds, so handsomely equipped with linen and table and kitchen ware as the hostelry of the Blue Sun; wherein he deceived neither himself nor any one else, the nearest inn being at least two days' travel distant.

In spite of himself Baron de Sigognac was somewhat ashamed at finding himself in the company of the strolling players, and hesitated to cross the threshold, for Blazius, the Tyrant, the Hector, and the Leander, desiring to do him honour, were holding back to allow him to pass, when the Isabella, divining the Baron's natural shyness, advanced towards him with a little resolute and pouting air.

“ You ought to be ashamed, Baron, to be colder and more reserved towards ladies than even Joseph or Hippolytus. Will you not offer me your arm to enter the inn ? ”

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

Sigognac bowed and hastened to hold out his hand to Isabella ; she rested the tips of her delicate fingers upon the Baron's well-worn sleeve in such a way as to make her light touch equivalent to an encouragement. Thus supported, he regained his courage, and entered the inn with a look of glory and triumph, little caring whether the whole world saw him, for in the gentle realm of France the man who escorts a pretty woman can never be ridiculous and excites envy only.

Chirriguirri advanced to meet his guests and placed his house at their disposal with a grandiloquence that told of the nearness of Spain. A leather jacket, like those worn by Maregates, fastened round the waist by a belt with a brass buckle, set off his athletic torso, but the end of his apron, tucked up at the corner, and a big knife in a wooden sheath, modified his somewhat grim aspect and tempered the ex-smuggler with a reassuring touch of the cook, just as his kindly smile counteracted the unpleasant effect of a deep cicatrice that, starting from the centre of the forehead, disappeared under the close-cropped hair. This cicatrice, which forcibly obtruded itself as Chirriguirri bowed, cap in hand, was marked by a purplish colour and a depression of the flesh that had failed to fill up completely the repulsive hiatus. A man had to be solidly built for his soul not to escape through such a cut, and Chirriguirri was indeed a stout fellow, whose soul, besides, was probably in no hurry to find out for itself what its fate in the next world was to be. Fussy and timorous travellers would no doubt have considered that the trade of innkeeper was uncommonly peaceable for a landlord with such a mien, but, as I have said, the Blue Sun was the only hostelry in that desert.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The room into which Sigognac and the players entered was far from being as splendid as Chirriguirri had depicted it. The flooring was merely beaten earth, and in the centre a sort of platform, made of big stones, answered for a hearth. An opening cut in the ceiling, and crossed by an iron bar from which hung a chain that hooked on to the pot-hanger, took the place of the grate and the flue, so that the whole upper part of the room was partially shrouded in a cloud of smoke that travelled slowly out of the opening when it was not driven downwards by the winds. The smoke had covered the rafters with a glaze of bitumen like that seen on old pictures, which contrasted with the fresh lime-wash on the walls.

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

Round three sides only of the hearth, — in order to allow the cook free access to the pots and pans, — wooden settles were set as steadily as possible upon the uneven floor that resembled the skin of a monstrous orange, and were chocked up with bits of broken pots or pieces of bricks. Here and there were a few stools formed of a seat stuck on three legs, one of which passed through and upheld a cross-board that might be used by way of a back by people careless of comfort, but which a sybarite would assuredly have considered an instrument of torture. A sort of hutch, set in a corner, completed the furniture, in which the roughness of the work was matched only by the coarseness of the materials. Splinters of pine, stuck in iron holders, cast over the place a red, smoky light, the sooty spirals mingling, when they reached a certain height, with the clouds sent up from the hearth. Two or three stewpans, hung along the wall like bucklers on the topsides of a trireme, — if this comparison be not too noble and heroic in this connection, — were faintly lighted up by this illumination and gleamed with bloody glister in the shadows. From the ceiling hung sinister at the end of an iron hook a long fitch of bacon that, seen in the smoke ascending from the hearth, looked alarmingly like the body of a man that had been hanged.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

No matter what the host might claim, the place was gloomy indeed, and a solitary traveller might very well, without being in the least a coward, be troubled with unpleasant fancies, and dread finding on the bill of fare a pasty of human flesh provided at the expense of a lonely voyager. The company of players, however, was too numerous for terrifying reflections of this nature to occur to the worthy actors, whose wandering life, besides, had inured them to the strangest of lodgings.

When the players entered the room, there was dozing, at the end of one of the settles, a small girl of eight or nine years of age; at least she looked no older, being uncommonly thin and puny. Her shoulders rested against the back of the bench; she had let fall upon her breast her head, from which hung long tangled locks of hair that prevented her features from being made out; the muscles of her neck, as slender as that of a plucked fowl, were drawn and appeared to have some difficulty in preventing the mass of hair from falling to the ground. Her arms hung limp down her sides, her hands were open, and her legs, too short to reach the ground, were hanging with one foot crossed over the other. Those legs of hers, as slender as spindles, had been turned a brick-red by the cold, the sun, and the weather, while abundant scratches, some recent, others healed, spoke of habitual rambles through copse and bush. Her feet, small and delicately shaped, were shod with gray dust only, probably the sole kind of covering they had ever known.

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

As for her dress, it was of the simplest, consisting of two garments: the one, a chemise of linen coarser than any sail-cloth, the other, a loose gown of yellow fustian, in Aragonese fashion, that had been cut out of the least worn part of her mother's skirt. The varicoloured embroidered bird that usually embellishes these skirts, had formed part of the breadth used in the making of the little girl's gown, no doubt because the threads of the wool had strengthened to a certain extent the much-worn stuff. The bird produced, in view of the way it was placed, the most remarkable effect, for the bill was on the waist and the claws on the edge of the lower seam, while the body, rumpled and disarranged by the folds, assumed the queerest positions and looked like one of the chimerical fowls in mediæval natural history books or in old Byzantine mosaics.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The Isabella, the Serafina, and the maid seated themselves on the bench, yet their united weights, joined to that of the by no means heavy little girl, scarcely sufficed to balance that of the duenna, who was seated at the other end. The men found places on the other settles, deferentially leaving an empty space between themselves and Baron de Sigognac.

A few handfuls of brushwood had revived the fire, and the crackling of the dry branches imparted a sense of comfort to the travellers, who were somewhat stiff after the fatigues of the day, and who, though they were unaware of the fact, were feeling the influence of the malaria prevalent in a district full of stagnant waters which the clayey soil refused to absorb.

Chirriguirri approached them courteously and with as much sweetness of aspect as he could impart to his naturally grim countenance.

“What shall I serve to your lordships? My house is stocked with everything suitable for the gentry, though it is a great pity that you did not arrive yesterday, I must say. I had prepared a boar’s head with pistachios that smelt so delightfully, that was so admirably spiced and so delicate to the taste that unfortunately there is not so much left as would fill a tooth.”

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

“Most sad indeed,” said the Pedant, licking his chops with relish at the imaginary feast. “I prefer a boar’s head with pistachios to all other delicacies, and I should willingly have made myself ill by eating overmuch of it.”

“And what would you have said of the venison pasty which the noblemen whom I entertained this morning devoured to the last crust, after having sacked the interior without giving the least quarter?”

“I should have said it was excellent, Master Chirriguirri, and I should have duly praised the cook’s incomparable merit. But of what avail is it to cruelly excite our appetites by the account of fallacious dishes that have been digested by this time, for I am sure you spared neither pepper, pimento, nutmeg, nor other thirst-excitors. Instead of these dead-and-gone dishes, the merit of which is beyond question, but which can in no wise sustain us, tell us what you have on your bill of fare for the day, for the aorist is most unwelcome in matters culinary and hunger at table loves the present indicative. Away with the past! It stands for despair and fasting; the future, at least, allows the stomach to indulge in pleasant anticipations. For pity’s sake, cease relating these vanished delicacies to poor devils who are jaded and hungry as a pack of hounds."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

"You are quite right, sir; remembrances are not very substantial," said Chirriguirri, with a gesture of assent, "yet I cannot but keenly regret that I should have allowed myself to run so short of provisions. My pantry was chock-full yesterday, and I was stupid enough to send off to the castle, not more than two hours since, my last six pots of ducks' livers, splendid livers at that, perfectly huge, regular morsels for a king's table."

"What a wedding at Cana and what a Gamacho's feast might be made of all the dishes you no longer have and that have been devoured by more fortunate guests! But you have kept us long enough on tenter-hooks. Come, confess, without further rhetoric, what you have actually got, now that you have told us so beautifully what you do not possess."

"Quite right, sir. Well, I have garbure, ham, and stock-fish," answered the innkeeper, with an effort at a modest blush, like a good housekeeper whose husband has unexpectedly brought three or four friends to dinner.

"In that case," shouted as one man the starving company, "bring on your stock-fish, your ham, and your garbure."

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

"And such garbure as it is," went on Boniface, recovering his coolness and making his voice ring. "Bread squares fried in the finest goose-dripping, curly-headed cabbage of most ambrosial savour, that Milan itself never equalled, and cooked in lard whiter than the snows that crown Maladetta ! A soup, in a word, fit to be served to the gods."

"You make my mouth water, but serve the soup at once, for I am absolutely faint with hunger," roared the Tyrant, with the look of an ogre smelling fresh meat.

"Zagarriga, lay the table quickly in the best room," shouted Chirriguirri to a waiter who was probably imaginary, for, in spite of the urgent intonation of his master, Zagarriga gave no sign of life.

"As for the ham, I trust your lordships will be pleased with it ; it may rival the most exquisite Channel and Bayonne hams ; it has been pickled with rock-salt, and with its streaks of pink and white is the most appetising morsel you ever set eyes upon."

"We are as convinced of the fact as of the truth of the Gospels," said the exasperated Pedant, "but produce instanter that gastronomical wonder, else your inn will become the scene of acts of cannibalism equalling those that have occurred on shipwrecked galleons and caravels. We have not committed as many crimes as my lord Tantalus that we should be tortured by the sight of vanishing food."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

"Right you are, sir," returned Chirriguirri, calmly. "Hallo there, the kitchen brigade! Stir your stumps, hump yourselves, hurry up! These noble travellers are desperately hungry and cannot wait."

But the kitchen brigade remained as unmoved as Zagarriga, for the very good reason that it did not exist and never had existed. The entire staff of the inn consisted of a tall, pale-faced, dishevelled girl called Mionnette, but in Chirriguirri's opinion the imaginary servants whom he constantly summoned gave an air to the inn, made it appear full of people, imparted bustle to it and justified the high prices he charged for the food supplied to travellers. The Boniface of the Blue Sun had so long called the imaginary servants by name that he had ended in believing in their existence, and he was almost surprised that they did not claim their wages, grateful though he was to them for not doing so.

Inferring from the low clatter of dishes in the next room that the table was not yet laid, the innkeeper, in order to gain time, entered upon a eulogy of the stock-fish, a somewhat unfruitful theme that called for no little eloquence. Fortunately for him, Chirriguirri was accustomed to impart a novel savour to the most insipid dishes by his spicy language.

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

“I dare say your lordships consider stock-fish a common sort of food, and your lordships are quite right, but there is stock-fish and stock-fish. This cod was caught on the Grand Banks by the boldest fisherman in the Bay of Biscay. It is choice stock-fish, white, savoury, toothsome, excellent when fried in Aix oil, and preferable to salmon, tunny, and sword-fish. Our Holy Father the Pope — may he grant us all indulgences — will have no other in Lent, and he eats it also on Fridays and Saturdays, and such other fast-days as happen along when he is tired of scoter and teal. Peter Lescorbat, from whom I get it, supplies His Holiness also. Papal stock-fish, I can tell you, is not to be despised, and your lordships are not likely to turn your noses up at it, else you would not be good Catholics.”

“We are none of us inclined to heresy,” returned the Pedant, “and we shall all be delighted to devour Papal stock-fish, but, by Bacchus, let that wonderful fish be kind enough to leap from the frying-pan into the dish, or we shall melt away like ghosts and phantoms at cock-crow."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

"It would not be proper to eat fish before soup; from a culinary point of view it would be putting the cart before the horse," answered Master Chirriguirri, with supreme disdain, "and your lordships are too well bred to indulge in such incongruities. Pray be patient; the garbure must boil just a little longer."

"By the Devil's horns and the Pope's nose," roared the Tyrant, "I should be satisfied with Spartan broth if it were only served up at once."

Baron de Sigognac said nothing and exhibited no impatience. He had eaten the night before. In the long days of starvation spent in his Tower of Hunger he had long since trained himself to hermit-like abstinence, and the frequent recurrence of meals surprised his sober stomach. Neither Isabella nor Serafina complained, for a show of voracity ill beseems young ladies who are supposed to live, like the bees, on dew and the honey of flowers. The Swashbuckler appeared to be delighted, for he had just drawn his belt tighter, and the tongue of the buckle played freely in the hole. The Leander yawned and showed his teeth, and the duenna had dozed off, three folds of flabby flesh showing under her bent chin.

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

The little girl that had been asleep at the other end of the settle had awakened and was sitting up. Her face could now be seen, for she had pushed back her hair, the colour of which seemed to have come off on her forehead, so dark was it. Under the tan of her face was visible a deep, waxen, mat pallor. The cheeks, with their prominent cheek-bones, were totally devoid of colour, and the blue, chapped lips were parted by a sickly smile that showed pearly white teeth. Life seemed to have concentrated itself in her eyes, which the thinness of her face caused to appear of extraordinary size, while the halo of broad dark circles around them imparted to them a strange and feverish brilliancy. The white of the eyes was almost blue, so strongly did it contrast with the deep brown of the pupils, and so thick and long were the eyelashes. At this moment those peculiar eyes were filled with an expression of childish admiration and ferocious covetousness, and were fixed unchangingly upon the jewels worn by the Isabella and the Serafina, though the little savage probably was not aware of their little worth. The flash of the imitation gold braid, the deceitful glister of a necklace of Venetian pearls, dazzled her and threw her into a kind of ecstasy. Plainly, she had never seen anything so beautiful in her whole life; her nostrils worked, her cheeks flushed, and a sardonic smile, interrupted from time to time by a sharp, rapid, and feverish chattering of the teeth, played upon her pale lips.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Fortunately none of the company paid any attention to the poor little bundle of rags agitated by nervous shivers; had they done so, they would have been startled by the fierce and sinister expression of the child's livid features.

Unable to control her curiosity, she put her brown delicate, cold hand, exactly like a monkey's paw, out towards Isabella's dress, and her fingers felt the stuff with marked pleasure and a sensation of voluptuous excitement. The rumpled velvet, shining on every seam, seemed to her the newest, richest, and softest stuff in the world.

Light as the touch was, Isabella turned round, noted the child's act, and smiled in motherly fashion upon her. Feeling herself looked at, the girl suddenly resumed an expression of childish stupidity, indicative only of idiotic lack of sense, and this with a skilled mimicry that would have done honour to an actress, an expert in her art. Then in a sing-song voice she said : —

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

“It is like the cope of Our Lady on the altar.”

After which she lowered her eyelashes, that reached to her cheek-bones, leaned back on the seat, clasped her hands together, and feigned to drop asleep as though overcome by fatigue.

Mionnette, the tall, pale girl, entered with the news that supper was ready, and the company passed into the next room.

The players did their best to do honour to the bill of fare, though it did not contain the promised delights, and satisfied their hunger, and especially their thirst, by repeated draughts from the wine-skin, almost flabby, like a bagpipe from which the wind has been exhausted.

They were just about to rise from table, when the barking of dogs and the sound of horses' hoofs was heard in the vicinity of the inn. Three knocks struck on the door with impatience and authority betokened the arrival of a traveller who was not used to be kept waiting. Mionnette sprang to the door, lifted the latch, and there entered a cavalier, who almost drove the door in her face, and who was preceded by a riot of dogs that nearly upset the maid and scattered through the room, leaping and jumping, hunting for bones and scraps on the plates that had been removed, and accomplishing in one minute with their tongues the work of three dish-washers.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

A few smart cuts of the whip, administered to the innocent and the guilty alike, calmed the tumult as by enchantment. The dogs, panting and their tongues lolling, took refuge under the settles, laid their heads between their paws or curled themselves up, while the horseman, clanking his spurs, entered the room where the players were eating with the assurance of one who feels at home wherever he may happen to be. Chirriguirri followed him, cap in hand, and, though not at all timid, with an obsequious and almost frightened look.

The gentleman, standing on the threshold, touched the brim of his beaver, and quietly glanced at the company of actors who were returning his salute. He looked to be about thirty or thirty-five years of age; his flushed, jovial face, the rosy tones of which had been turned a deeper red by the open air and exercise, was framed in by golden curly hair. His prominent eyes were blue and somewhat hard; his nose, slightly turned up, ended in a sharply cut facet; a pair of small reddish mustaches, waxed at the ends and curled up, twirled under his nose like commas, and the symmetry was completed by a tuft in the form of an artichoke petal. Between the mustaches and the tuft opened a mouth the upper lip of which compensated by its thinness for the excess of sensuality in the lower, that was full, broad, red, and marked with perpendicular lines. The chin curved up abruptly and caused the hair of the tuft to stick out. The forehead which the cavalier bared as he threw his beaver upon a stool was white and smooth, being protected from the rays of the sun by the hat, and proved that the nobleman, ere he left the court for the country, must have had a very delicate complexion. On the whole his was an agreeable face, in which the jollity of the boon companion softened the pride of the aristocrat.

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

His costume was proof that the Marquis, for such was his rank, had not, though he lived in a distant province, severed his connection with the most modish tailors and mercers of the capital. A collar of point-lace set off his neck and fell over a doublet of lemon-yellow cloth embroidered with silver. The doublet was very short and allowed a mass of fine linen to puff out between it and the trunks. The sleeves of the doublet, or of the bodice rather, allowed the shirt to show up to the elbows. The trunks, adorned with a sort of puffed apron of straw-coloured ribbon, fell to a little below the knee, where they were met by soft leather boots armed with silver spurs. A blue cloak, trimmed with silver lace, thrown upon one shoulder and held there by a loop, completed a dress that was somewhat too rich for the country and the time of year, but which may be accounted for by the simple fact that the Marquis had just been hunting with the fair Yolande and had dressed himself out in his best with the intention of maintaining his former reputation as a dandy, for at the Cours-la-Reine he had won admiration among the bloods and the exquisites.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“Soup for my dogs, a measure of oats for my horse, bread and ham for myself, and a snack of some sort for my man,” said the Marquis, in hearty fashion, as he sat down at the foot of the table, close by the maid, who, seeing a handsome nobleman so richly attired, had let fly at him a most alluring glance and a compelling smile.

Chirriguirri placed before the Marquis a pewter plate and a tankard of the same metal; the maid, graceful as Hebe, poured him out a bumper which he drained at a draught. After a few moments devoted to silently stilling the pangs of a hunter's hunger, the fiercest of all, and equalling in its intensity the boulimia of the Greeks, the Marquis let his glance wander round the table, and among the players he noticed, seated by Isabella's side, Baron de Sigognac, whom he knew by sight and whom he had come across that day when the hunt had dashed across in front of the oxen.

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

Isabella was smiling to the Baron, who was whispering to her, with the sort of faint, languorous smile, the caress of the soul, the mark of sympathy rather than the expression of gaiety, which could not be mistaken by any one who had had much intercourse with women, as was the case with the Marquis. He ceased to wonder at Sigognac's presence in the company of strolling players, and the contempt inspired in him by the poor Baron's dilapidated attire was considerably diminished. The idea of the young gentleman following his love on the car of Thespis through all manner of adventures, whether comic or tragic, struck him as betokening a true lover's imagination and a determined mind. He nodded to Sigognac to let him know he had recognised him and that he fathomed his purpose, but, like the well-bred man he was, he respected his incognito and appeared to devote himself exclusively to the maid, to whom he was paying exaggerated compliments, half true, half mocking, which she received in similar fashion with bursts of laughter admirably adapted to show in its entirety her splendid set of teeth.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The Marquis, desirous of pushing forward a love affair that seemed to promise success, thought fit all of a sudden to declare himself particularly fond of the drama and a sound judge of acting. He complained that in the provinces one lacked this pleasure so well-fitted to exercise the intellect, to refine the language, to increase politeness and to improve manners; then, addressing himself to the Tyrant, who appeared to be the leader of the company, he asked him whether they had any engagements that would prevent their giving a few performances of the best plays in their repertory in the château of Bruyères, where it would be a simple matter to erect a stage in the great hall or in the orangery.

The Tyrant, smiling in silly fashion in his big hairy beard, replied that nothing was easier, and that his troupe, one of the very best touring in the provinces, was entirely at his lordship's service, from the King down to the maid, added he, with a feigned air of innocence.

"Nothing could be better," answered the Marquis, "and as regards terms there shall be no difficulty; you shall yourself fix the amount of remuneration, for one should never bargain with Thalia, a Muse greatly in favour with Apollo, and as highly considered at Court as in the city and the provinces, seeing that in the latter we are not quite so untutored as it is the fashion in Paris to believe."

THE INN OF THE BLUE SUN

With these words the Marquis, after significantly pressing the soubrette's knee with his own, without the young person being in the least offended, rose from table, pulled his beaver down over his eyes, waved a good-bye to the company and went off amid the baying of his pack. He was riding on ahead in order to prepare for the reception of the players at his château.

It was already late, and the start was to be made very early the next morning, for Bruyères was rather far off, and though a barb is quite able to do easily its ten or twelve miles along cross-roads, a heavily laden chariot, drawn by tired oxen along a sandy high-road, takes a good deal more time.

The women retired into a sort of garret in which had been put bundles of straw; the men remained in the room, settling themselves as best they could upon the benches and stools.

IV
SCARECROW HIGHWAYMEN

SCARECROW HIGHWAYMEN

Indeed, as soon as the players had left the room, she carefully opened her dark eyes, looked searchingly into every corner of the room, and when she had made certain that there was no one there, she slipped from the bench to the floor, stood up, threw back her hair by a gesture that was habitual to her, and made for the door, which she opened without more noise than if she had been a phantom. She closed it with infinite precaution, taking care the latch should not fall back too suddenly, then slowly walked off to the corner of a hedge, round which she disappeared.

SCARECROW HIGHWAY MEN

Feeling sure then that she could no longer be seen from the house, she started on a run, leaping across the ditches full of stagnant water, striding across the fallen pines, and bounding over the moor like a doe pursued by a pack of hounds. Her long hair lashed her face like black serpents, and sometimes, falling upon her forehead, blinded her. In such cases, without diminishing her speed, she pushed it back behind her ears with the palm of the hand, making a gesture of saucy impatience, though her swift feet needed not the help of sight, so well were they acquainted with the road.

The aspect of the place, so far as it could be made out by the livid light of a clouded moon, was peculiarly desolate and lugubrious. A few pines, looking like spectres of murdered trees, thanks to the cut made in the bark to allow the resin to flow, exhibited their reddish wounds along a sandy road, which showed white even in the darkness of night. Beyond, on either side of the way, stretched the dark purple heath, over which hung banks of grayish vapours to which the beams of the orb of night imparted the air of a line of phantoms, well calculated to strike terror into the minds of superstitious people or of those unaccustomed to the natural phenomena of the region.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The child, no doubt used to these phantasms of the desert, paid no attention to them and kept steadily on her way. She at last reached a sort of hillock, topped with a score or more of pines that formed a kind of wood. With remarkable agility, and without any sign of fatigue, she climbed the fairly steep slope and reached the crest of the mound. Standing there, she cast her eyes, apparently capable of piercing the darkness, around her for some time, and seeing nothing but empty space, she put two fingers in her mouth and whistled three times in a way that a traveller, traversing the woods at night, never hears without a secret shudder, even though he believes it is the cry of timid owls or other inoffensive creatures.

She paused between each whistle, else her call might have been mistaken for the hooting of the orfrays, the honey-buzzards, and the owls, so perfect was the imitation. Soon a heap of leaves stirred, swelled up, shook itself like an animal awakened out of sleep, and a human form rose slowly before the little lass.

“Is that you, Chiquita?” said the man. “What is the news? I did not expect you, and I was having a sleep.”

SCARECROW HIGHWAYMEN

The man roused by Chiquita's call was a lusty fellow of twenty-five or thirty years of age, of medium stature, thin, muscular, and fit, to all appearance, for stratagems and spoils of all sorts. He could turn smuggler of goods or salt, poacher, thief, and cut-throat, following one or the other of these honest pursuits, or all together, as occasion called for them.

In the moonbeam that fell upon him from a rift in the clouds, like the rays of a dark lantern, he stood out clear against the dark background of the pines, and it would have been possible, had any one been there, to examine his mien and his dress, both characteristically truculent. His face, of a coppery tan like that of a native of the Caribbees, brought out by contrast his brilliant hawk's eyes, and his particularly white teeth, the very sharp canines being exactly like a young wolf's fangs. A handkerchief was bound round his brow like a bandage upon a wound, and held in his thick, curly, rebellious hair, that stuck up like a crest upon the top of his head; a blue vest faded by long use, and adorned with buttons made of coins soldered to a metal stalk, clothed his torso; canvas breeches hung loosely on his thighs and the fastenings of his alpargatas criss-crossed round his legs that were as clean and muscular as a deer's. His costume was completed by a broad red woollen sash that came up to his armpits from the hips, and that was twisted several times round his waist. A protuberance in front indicated that it served the rascal as pantry and treasury, and if he had turned round there would have been seen, projecting above and below the sash on his back, a long Valencia navaja, one of the fish-shaped knives, the blade of which is fastened by twisting a copper ring, and that bears on its steel as many red scores as the owner of the weapon has murdered men. I do not know how many of these scarlet grooves adorned Agostino's navaja, but judging from the fellow's looks it might well be supposed that they were numerous. Such was the individual with whom Chiquita maintained secret relations.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

"Well, Chiquita," said Agostino, stroking in friendly way the child's head with his rough hand, "what have you seen at Chirriguirri's inn?"

"A chariot full of travellers has come," answered the child. "Five big trunks were taken into the shed, and they appeared to be heavy, for it took two men to carry each."

"Huh!" said Agostino, "travellers sometimes put stones into their trunks in order to win respect from innkeepers. That sort of thing is not unknown."

SCARECROW HIGHWAYMEN

"But," retorted Chiquita, "the three young ladies in the party have gold-braided dresses. One of them, the prettiest, wears round her neck a string of big silvery beads that shine in the light, and that are, oh! so lovely, so beautiful!"

"Pearls those are; that's good," muttered the bandit. "Provided they are not imitation. The Murano people are uncommonly clever, and gallants nowadays are so lax in their morals."

"Dear Agostino," went on Chiquita, in pleading tones, "if you cut the pretty lady's throat, you will give me the necklace, will you not?"

"It would become you wonderfully, would n't it? Harmonise with your tousled head, your dust-cloth chemise, and your canary-coloured skirt."

"I have kept watch so often for you, I have run so often to warn you even when the mists were rising from the ground and the dew wetted my poor bare feet. Have I ever kept you waiting for food in your hiding-places, even when I was shivering with fever and my teeth chattered like the beak of a stork on the edge of a swamp, and when I could scarcely drag myself through the thickets and the underbrush ? ”

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“ Yes, indeed,” replied the brigand, “ you are a brave and faithful girl, but we have not got the necklace yet. How many men did you count ? ”

“ Oh, a lot of them ! One stout and strong with a big beard on his face, an old one, two thin ones, one that looks like a fox and another who looks like a gentleman, though he has very mean clothes.”

“ Six men,” said Agostino, thoughtfully, as he reckoned on his fingers. “ Alas ! I should not have feared that number in the old days, but I am the only one left of my company. Are they armed, Chiquita ? ”

“ The nobleman has his sword and the tall thin fellow has a rapier.”

“ No pistols ? No arquebuse ? ”

“ Not that I saw,” answered Chiquita, “ unless they were left in the chariot, but in that case Chirriguirri or Mionnette would have let me know by a sign.”

“ Well, we shall risk making the attempt and prepare an ambuscade,” said Agostino, making up his mind. “ Five trunks, gold lace, and a pearl necklace ; I have gone to work for less.”

The brigand and the little girl entered the wood, and having reached its deepest part, they busied themselves moving stones and armfuls of brushwood, and ere long laid bare five or six planks covered with earth. Agostino raised the boards, threw them to one side, and descended into the black, gaping opening up to his waist. Was it the entrance to the subterranean way or a cavern, the customary retreat of the brigand? Was it his hiding-place for stolen goods? Or the ossuary where he interred the bodies of his victims? The latter supposition would have seemed the most probable to a spectator, had there been any other there than the owls perched in the pine-trees.

SCARECROW HIGHWAYMEN

Agostino bent down and seemed to be looking for something at the bottom of the hole; then he drew himself up, holding in his arms a human form, stiff as a dead body, which he unceremoniously cast upon the edge of the excavation. Chiquita betrayed not the least fear of the thing thus strangely exhumed, and drew the body by the feet to some little distance from the grave, exhibiting an amount of strength that no one would have supposed she possessed, judging by her slight frame. Agostino, pursuing his dreadful work, drew from this Aceldama five more bodies, which the girl placed by the side of the first, smiling the while like a young ghoul preparing to feast in a graveyard. The open grave, the bandit dragging from their rest the remains of his victims, the little maid helping at the ghastly job, formed, under the dark shadows of the pines, a sight well fitted to terrify the bravest of men.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The bandit picked up one of the bodies, carried it to the crest of the scarp, stuck it upright and kept it in that position by driving into the ground the pole to which it was lashed. Thus upheld, the dead body looked, in the darkness, fairly like a living man.

“Alas! to what am I reduced by misfortune and evil days,” said Agostino, with a deep groan. “Instead of a company of stout fellows, handling knife and arquebuse like picked soldiers, I have left only mannikins covered with rags, scarecrows for travellers, mere dumb supernumeraries in my solitary exploits. This one was Mataserpies, the valiant Spaniard, my bosom friend, a delightful fellow who scored crosses on the faces of the chuckle-heads as cleanly with his navaja as with a brush dipped in red. A well-born gentleman, to boot, and as proud as if he had sprung from the loins of Jove himself, offering his arm to the ladies to assist them to get down from their coach, and turning out like a ghastly ghoul preparing to feast in a graveyard. The open grave, the bandit dragging from their rest the remains of his victims, the little maid helping at the ghastly job, formed, under the dark shadows of the pines, a sight well fitted to terrify the bravest of men.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The bandit picked up one of the bodies, carried it to the crest of the scarp, stuck it upright and kept it in that position by driving into the ground the pole to which it was lashed. Thus upheld, the dead body looked, in the darkness, fairly like a living man.

"Alas! to what am I reduced by misfortune and evil days," said Agostino, with a deep groan. "Instead of a company of stout fellows, handling knife and arquebuse like picked soldiers, I have left only mannikins covered with rags, scarecrows for travellers, mere dumb supernumeraries in my solitary exploits. This one was Mataserpies, the valiant Spaniard, my bosom friend, a delightful fellow who scored crosses on the cheeks of the chuckle-heads as cleanly with his navaja as with a brush dipped in red. A well-born gentleman, brave as a lion, and as proud as if he had sprung from the loins of a king, he was always ready to assist me in my adventures. He was the first to get down from their coach, and turning out the pockets of common folk in truly grand and regal fashion. There are his cloak, his collar, and his sombrero with the flame-coloured feather which I piously stole from the executioner for relics, and with which I have dressed this straw man that has taken the place of my young hero, worthy of a better fate. Poor Mataserpies, how it did annoy him to be hanged; not that he cared a rap about death itself, but as a nobleman he claimed it was his right to have his head cut off. Unfortunately he had not his genealogy in his pocket and had perforce to die upright."

SCARECROW HIGHWAY MEN

Returning to the excavation, Agostino picked up another mannikin wearing a blue cap: —

"And this one was Isquibaival, a wonder, a valiant man, with his heart in his work; he suffered from excess of zeal at times and allowed himself to massacre every one. It is a mistake to kill off customers, by Jove! But for the rest, not greedy of the spoils and always satisfied with his share. He despised gold and cared for blood only, the fine fellow. And how bravely he bore himself under the blows dealt him by the executioner when he was broken on the wheel in the main square at Orthez! Neither Regulus nor Saint Bartholomew bore up better under their sufferings. He was your father, Chiquita. Honour his memory and say a prayer for the repose of his soul."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The little girl crossed herself and her lips moved as if she were repeating sacred words.

The third scarecrow wore a morion and rattled as Agostino lifted it up. An iron cuirass showed dull upon his ragged buff jerkin, and targes rattled upon his thighs. The bandit furbished up the armour on the arms in order to make it shine.

"A flash of metal in the shadows occasionally inspires a salutary terror. People think they have to do with men-at-arms on a vacation. He was an old trooper, he was : doing his job on the high-road as on the field of battle, coolly, methodically, obediently. He was taken from me by a pistol-shot in the face ; an irreparable loss ! But I shall avenge him."

The fourth phantom, draped in a ragged cloak, was, like the others, honoured with a funeral eulogy. He had died under torture, being too modest to own to his great deeds and having refused with heroic constancy to reveal the name of his accomplices to over-inquisitive judges.

The fifth, representing Florizel of Bordeaux, obtained no post-mortem discourse from Agostino, but merely an expression of regret tempered by hope. Florizel, the deftest cloak-snatcher in the province, was not, like the others, less lucky than himself, swinging in chains from a gibbet, washed by the rain and eaten of the crows; he was travelling in the King's galleys on the Oceanic and Mediterranean seas. He was merely a cut-purse among brigands, a fox in a company of wolves, but he was apt, and, with the training to be gained in the school of the galleys, he might make his mark: a man does not attain perfection all at once. Agostino was impatiently awaiting the moment when this dear chap would escape from the bagno and return to him.

SCARECROW HIGHWAYMEN

Stout and short, dressed in a smock-frock drawn in at the waist with a belt, and wearing a broad-brimmed hat, a sixth mannikin was planted somewhat in front of the others as if in command of the squad.

"You deserve the place of honour," said Agostino to the figure, "you patriarch of the high-road, Nestor of cloak-snatchers, Ulysses of burglars, O great Lavidalotte, my guide and my teacher, who received me into the company of the Knights of the Road and transformed me from a wretched tyro into a practised bandit. You taught me slang, showed me how to disguise myself in a score of different ways, like the late Proteus when people were hot-foot after him ; you trained me to hurl a knife into a knot in a board at thirty paces ; to snuff a candle with a pistol-shot ; to pass through locks like the wind ; to wander invisible about houses, just as if I had carried a dead man's hand about with me ; to discover the best-concealed hiding-places without having recourse to a hazel wand. How much good doctrine I did learn from you, O great man ! And how plainly you made me perceive, by sound reasoning, that work was meant for fools. Why did envious fate make you starve to death in this cavern, every egress from which was watched, but into which the minions of the law did not dare venture, for no one, brave though he may be, cares to face the lion in its den ; even when dying, it is capable of striking down four or five men with paw or teeth. Come, then, you whose unworthy successor I am, command worthily this little company of bogies and scarecrows, these mannikins representing the brave fellows who have gone before, and who, though dead, will still, like the Cid, strike terror into men. Your shades, O glorious bandits, will suffice to strip those jackanapes."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Having finished his work, the bandit took his stand on the road in order to judge of the effect of the masquerade. The straw brigands looked really quite terrifying and fierce, and a fearful eye might well be misled in the shades of night or in the dawn of morning, at that weird hour, when old willows, with their stumpy branches on the edge of the ditches, look like men armed with cutlasses or shaking their fists.

SCARECROW HIGHWAYMEN

“Agostino,” said Chiquita, “you have forgotten to arm the mannikins.”

“True,” replied the brigand. “What was I thinking of? Well, the greatest geniuses nod at times; however, the matter can be speedily mended.”

Whereupon he fastened to the ends of the inert arms old arquebuse rests, rusty swords, and even mere sticks placed like muskets at the ready. Thus armed, the troop looked formidable enough as it stood along the slope.

“As it is a long journey from the village to the place where they will dine, they will no doubt start at three in the morning, and by the time they have reached our ambush, day will be breaking; the most favourable moment, for we want neither too much light, nor too much darkness for our fellows. Daylight would betray them; darkness would conceal them. Meanwhile, let us have a nap ; the creaking of the ungreased chariot wheels that scares away wolves will awaken us, and as we never sleep but with one eye open, like cats, we shall soon be up."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Having thus spoken, Agostino stretched himself out upon a bundle of heather ; Chiquita nestled close to him in order to benefit by the Valencian capa de muestra which he had thrown over himself by way of a blanket, and to warm her poor little limbs shivering with fever. Soon the warmth cradled her, her teeth ceased chattering, and she went off into dreamland. I am bound to own that her dreams were not filled with handsome rosy cherubs wearing cravats of white wings and fluttering about, or with lambs duly washed and soaped and adorned with favours, or with caramel palaces with colonnades of angelica ; on the contrary, Chiquita beheld in her visions Isabella's head cut off, the pearl necklace between its teeth, and endeavouring, by irregular and precipitate leaps, to escape the child's outstretched hands. Chiquita was greatly agitated by this dream, and Agostino, half awakened by her kicking, grunted as he snored :

"If you do not keep quiet, I'll kick you down to the foot of the slope, where you may squirm round with the frogs."

SCARECROW HIGHWAYMEN

Chiquita, who was aware that Agostino was a man of his word, took the hint and remained quite still. Soon the sound of their regular breathing alone told of the presence of human beings in that lonely place.

The brigand and his tiny accomplice were drinking deep from the black cup of sleep, in the midst of the moor, when at the Inn of the Blue Sun, the ox-driver, striking his goad on the ground, warned the players that it was time to set out.

They settled down as best they could in the chariot on the trunks that formed all sorts of corners, and the Tyrant compared himself to Polyphemus, lying on a mountain-top, which did not prevent his very soon snoring like an organ pipe. The women had smuggled themselves away at the back, under the canvas top, where the folded scene-drops formed a sort of mattress relatively soft. In spite of the horrible creaking of the wheels that sobbed, miauled, hiccupped, groaned, everybody soon sank into fitful slumber, filled with incoherent and fantastic dreams in which the noises made by the chariot were transformed into howls of wild beasts or cries of murdered children.

Sigognac, disturbed by the novelty of the adventure and the bustle of this Bohemian life, so different from the cloistered quiet of his ancestral manor, was walking by the side of the vehicle. He was thinking of the adorable grace of Isabella, whose beauty and modesty spoke more of the high-born lady than of the wandering player, and he was wondering how he could ever manage to make her love him, utterly unconscious of the fact that she already did so, and that the dear girl, touched to the very depths of her being, was only waiting for him to ask for her heart to give it to him. The timid Baron was arranging in his mind innumerable terrible and romantic incidents and proofs of devotion such as are to be met with in books of chivalry, in order to pave the way for the tremendous confession at the very thought of which his heart failed him. Yet that confession, which cost him so much, had already been made in the plainest fashion by the fire of his glance, the trembling of his voice, the sound of his ill-repressed sighs, the somewhat awkward attentions he paid to Isabella, and the absent-minded replies he made to the players. Nor, although he had breathed no word of love to the young lady herself, had she failed to understand him.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The day was just breaking; a narrow strip of faint light was stretching along the plain, bringing out clearly, in spite of the distance, the black outlines of the swaying heather and even the blades of grass. A few pools of water, touched by the gleam, shone here and there like the pieces of a broken mirror. Faint sounds made themselves heard, and smoke was arising in the still air, indicating the resumption of human activity in the midst of the wilderness. Against the luminous band, now turning to a rosy tint, showed a quaint figure, resembling at a distance a pair of dividers held in an invisible hand engaged in measuring the moor. It was a shepherd on his stilts, walking spider-like through the swamps and the sand.

SCARECROW HIGHWAYMEN

This was no new sight for Sigognac, and he paid little attention to it, but though deeply sunk in reverie, he could not help remarking a little shining point that sparkled under the still deep shadow of the clump of pines where I left Agostino and Chiquita. It could not be a glow-worm; the season when love makes these creatures phosphorescent was many months past. Could it be the eye of a one-eyed night-bird, for there was but one luminous point? Sigognac was not satisfied with this explanation; to him it looked more like the sputtering of a lighted linstock.

Meanwhile the chariot kept on its way, and as it drew nearer the pine clump, Sigognac thought he made out on the crest a row of queer-looking beings placed as if in ambush, their forms dimly visible in the rays of the rising sun. As, however, they remained absolutely motionless, he took them for old stumps of trees; laughed internally at his own suspicion, and forbore awaking the players, as he had at first thought of doing.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The vehicle rolled on a little farther. The shining point on which Sigognac still fixed his glance changed its position; a long stream of fire flashed through a puff of white smoke; a loud explosion was heard, and a ball flattened itself upon the yoke of the oxen, that started violently aside, dragging the chariot with them, but happily stopped on the edge of the ditch by a heap of sand.

The report and the jolt woke up the whole company with a start, and the young women began to scream. The duenna alone, accustomed to adventures, kept quiet and prudently slipped the two or three doubloons she kept in her girdle between her stocking and the sole of her shoe.

Standing at the head of the chariot from which the players were endeavouring to emerge, Agostino, his

SCARECROW HIGHWAYMEN

Valencian cloak rolled round his arm, his navaja in his hand, shouted in a voice of thunder : —

“Your purses or your lives ! Any resistance is useless ; at the least sign of it my men will fire upon you !”

While the bandit was thus uttering his highwayman’s ultimatum, the Baron, whose stout heart could not brook the insolence of such a rascal, had quietly drawn his sword and dashed upon him. Agostino parried the Baron’s lunges with his cloak and was watching for an opportunity to use his navaja upon him. Resting the handle of the weapon against the upper part of his arm and balancing the latter with a sharp motion, he hurled the blade against Sigognac’s waist. Lucky was he to be thin ; a slight side motion enabled him to avoid the murderous point, and the weapon fell at a distance. Agostino blanched, for he was now disarmed, and he was well aware that his scarecrow troop could be of no possible assistance to him. Nevertheless, trusting to the effect of terror, he called out : “Fire, my lads !” The players, afraid of the musketry, retreated and took refuge behind the chariot in which the women were yelling like jays plucked alive. Sigognac himself, brave as he was, could not help ducking his head.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Chiquita, who had followed the whole affair hidden behind a bush, between the branches of which she looked out, on seeing the perilous position of her friend, crawled like an adder along the dusty road, picked up the knife unnoticed by any one, and, springing up, handed the navaja to the bandit. Proud and savage was the expression that shone on the child's pale face; her dark eyes flashed, her face worked, and her half-open lips revealed two rows of hungry teeth that gleamed like those of a wild beast at bay. Her whole small figure breathed indomitable hatred and revolt.

For the second time Agostino balanced his knife, and Baron de Sigognac might have been stopped at the outset of his adventures but that an iron grip most opportunely caught the bandit's wrist. The hand, that gripped like a vice when the screw is being turned, crushed the muscles, bruised the bones, swelled the veins, and drove the blood under the nails. In vain did Agostino endeavour to free himself by the most desperate efforts; he dared not turn round, for the Baron would have pinked him in the back, and he was still parrying his thrusts with his left arm, though he felt that his captive hand would be torn from his arm with the muscles if he persisted in trying to free it. The pain became so acute that his numbed fingers opened and let fall the weapon.

SCARECROW HIGHWAYMEN

It was the Tyrant, who, coming up behind Agostino, had done Sigognac this yeoman service. Suddenly he called out : —

“The devil ! Is that an adder biting me ? I felt two sharp fangs strike into my leg.”

Chiquita it was who was biting his calf like a dog to compel him to turn round, but the Tyrant, without letting go of Agostino, shook off the little girl and sent her flying ten yards off on the road. The Hector, bending his long grasshopper-like limbs, bent down, picked up the knife, shut it, and slipped it into his pocket.

In the mean time the sun was slowly rising above the horizon ; a portion of its ruddy disk was showing above the level of the moor, and in the clear light the mannikins were losing more and more their look of human beings.

“Look here,” said the Pedant, “it strikes me that the arquebuses of these gentry have been hanging fire on account of the night-damp. However it may be, they are not very brave, for they are leaving their leader in the lurch and standing as still as stocks.”

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“And for a very good reason,” replied the Hector, as he scaled the bank; “they are straw figures dressed in rags, armed with old iron, and admirably adapted to scare away birds from cherry-trees and vineyards.”

With six successive kicks he sent the six grotesque figures flying into the middle of the road, where they flattened out with the irresistibly comical gestures of marionettes the strings of which have been let go. Dislocated and spread out, the mannikins were a parody, at once buffoon and sinister, of dead bodies left lying on a battlefield.

“You may alight, ladies,” said the Baron to the actresses; “there is nothing to be afraid of; it was only a painted peril.”

Grieved at the failure of a trick that usually succeeded, so great is the cowardice of people and so much does fear distort objects, Agostino hung his head with a piteous look. Near him stood Chiquita, frightened, haggard, and angry, like a night-bird surprised by the daylight. The bandit dreaded lest the players, who were numerous, should take it on themselves to punish him or else to hand him over to the officers of the law, but the joke of the mannikins had excited their laughter and they were roaring over it in right good fashion. Now laughter does not incline to severity ; it distinguishes man from the animal creation, and according to Homer is the appanage of the immortal and blessed gods who olympically laugh their fill during the leisure hours of eternity.

SCARECROW HIGHWAYMEN

So the Tyrant, of a kindly disposition at all times, relaxed his grip, and while still keeping good hold of the bandit, said to him in his big tragedy voice, the inflections of which he at times used in familiar speech :—

“You rascal, you frightened these ladies, and deserve therefore to be hanged with short shift, but if, as I fancy, they are inclined to pardon you, for they are merciful souls, I shall not take you to the sheriff. The trade of purveyor to the gibbet is not to my taste, and besides your stratagem was quite picaresque and amusing. It is a very good trick for getting coin out of your coward merchants. I appreciate it, being myself an actor conversant with tricks and subterfuges, and your inventiveness induces me to be indulgent to you. You are not a mere dull, low thief, and it would be a pity to cut short so fine a career.”

“Alas !” returned Agostino, “I have no choice, and I am more to be pitied than you are aware. All that is left of my company, once as numerous as your own, is myself; the executioner has deprived me of my leading man, my heavy father, and my general utility man. I must perforce perform my play alone on the stage of the high road, changing my voice and dressing up mannikins in order to make people believe I have a numerous troop at my back. A melancholy fate, I warrant you. Then scarcely a soul ever comes along this way : it has acquired such a bad name, what with its quagmires and its difficulties for foot passengers, horses, and carriages. It comes from nowhere and leads nowhere, but I cannot afford to buy the right to a better one. Every road fairly travelled has its own company. Idlers who work fancy a highwayman's life is all roses; there are plenty of thorns in it. I would like well enough to be an honest man, but what would be the use of presenting myself at city gates with such a truculent mug as mine and so abominably ragged a dress? The dogs would bite me, and the officers collar me, if I had a collar. And now my plan has gone all to smash, a plan that was so well thought out, so well carried out, and that was to provide me with the means of buying a cape for poor little Chiquita. I never have any luck; I must have been born under an unpropitious star. Yesterday I had to draw my belt tighter by way of dinner. Your most uncalled-for courage takes the bread from my mouth, and since I have failed to rob you, you might at least give me alms."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

SCARECROW HIGHWAY MEN

"There is sense in that," answered the Tyrant. "We have prevented your practising your trade, and we do owe you some compensation. There, drink our healths with these two pistoles."

Isabella drew from the chariot a piece of dress stuff which she presented to Chiquita.

"Oh, it is the necklace of white beads that I would like," said the child, with a look of intense desire.

The actress undid the ornament and fastened it round the little girl's neck. Amazed and delighted, Chiquita silently rolled the white grains between her brown fingers, bending her head and trying to see the necklace upon her poor thin bosom; then she suddenly looked up, threw back her hair, gazed at Isabella with her blazing eyes, and said in a strange, deep tone: —

"You are good; I shall never kill you!"

And leaping the ditch, she ran to a little mound on top of which she sat down to examine her treasure.

Agostino bowed his thanks, picked up his damaged

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

mannikins, carried them back to the pine grove and buried them again until need for them should arise. Then the chariot, which the ox-driver had abandoned to its fate at the very first shot, leaving the travellers to get out of the mess as best they could, started slowly, the man having returned to his duty. The duenna took the doubloons out of her shoes and quietly returned them to the recesses of her pocket.

“You have behaved like a hero of romance,” said Isabella to Sigognac, “and under your protection one travels in safety. How bravely you did charge that bandit, believing him backed by a well-armed troop!”

“The danger was not very great; it was scarcely a skirmish,” modestly returned the Baron. “For your sake I would cut giants down to the belt, scatter a whole array of Saracens, fight amid whirlwinds of smoke and flame, orcas, cockatrices, and dragons; I would traverse enchanted forests, and descend into the infernal regions like Æneas and without carrying a golden bough. In the light of your lovely eyes all would be easy for me, for your presence, nay, the mere thought of you, fills me with superhuman strength.”

The rhetoric was somewhat exaggerated, it may be, and Asiatically hyperbolical, as Longinus might say, but it had the merit of sincerity. Isabella did not for one moment doubt but that Sigognac would perform in her honour all those doughty deeds, worthy of Amadis of Gaul, Esplandion and Florimart of Hyrcania. And she was right; it was the most genuine feeling that inspired the Baron, growing every moment more and more in love with her, with such magniloquence. Love can never find words strong enough to express what it wants to say. Serafina, who had heard the young man's words, could not help smiling, for every young woman is prone to consider ridiculous protestations of love addressed to some one not herself, though if these same declarations were to be switched off to her, she would deem them most natural. For one brief instant Serafina thought of trying the effect of her own charms upon Sigognac and luring him away from her friend, but the fancy was a passing one. Though not absolutely selfish, Serafina said to herself that beauty was a gem that should be set in gold. She possessed the gem, but the gold was lacking, and the Baron was so disastrously seedy that he could not possibly furnish the setting or even the casket. So the seasoned coquette kept back the glance she had made ready, saying to herself that that sort of flirtation might be good enough for an ingénue, but not for a leading lady, and therewith she resumed her serene, careless look.

SCARECROW HIGHWAYMEN

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Silence fell upon the company in the chariot, and sleep was beginning to cast its dust in the eyes of the travellers, when the ox-driver said : —

“There is the château of Bruyères!”

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

V AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

THE castle of Bruyères showed to great advantage upon that lovely morning. The Marquis's domains were situated upon the borders of the moor and lay wholly within the arable district, the dying billows of the infertile white sand breaking at the foot of the park walls. An air of prosperity, which presented the strongest contrast with the surrounding waste, struck pleasantly upon the gaze the moment the estate was entered upon; it was like the isle of Macaria in the midst of a desolate sea.

A ha-ha fence, with a handsome stone revetment, enclosed the property without masking the building. In the moat shimmered the emerald checkering of brilliant spring water, the purity of which was unblemished by any aquatic growths and testified to the care taken of it. It was spanned by a bridge of stone and brick, of breadth sufficient to allow of two carriages driving abreast upon it, and it was protected by a balustraded parapet. At its inner end rose a magnificent gate of wrought iron, a masterpiece of iron-work that might have been fashioned by Vulcan himself. The leaves of the gate were hung upon two quadrangular metal pillars, wrought in open work, simulating an order of architecture, and supporting an architrave above which blossomed a mass of twisted scrolls whence sprang foliage and flowers that curved in with antithetical symmetry. In the centre of this ornamental medley shone the Marquis's coat-of-arms: or, a fesse embattled and counter-embattled gules, with two wild men for supporters. On either side of the gate bristled upon volutes resembling the flourishes of a calligraphist on vellum, sharp-leaved iron spikes, intended to prevent agile marauders from leaping from the bridge past the sides of the gate into the grounds. A few gilded flowers and ornaments mingling discreetly with the severity of the metal, tempered the defensive aspect of the iron-work and caused it to appear merely elegant. It was an almost regal entrance gate, and when a serving-man, wearing the Marquis's livery, had opened it, the oxen dragging the chariot hesitated to enter, as though they were dazzled by its magnificence and ashamed of their rusticity. They had to be prodded with the goad to compel them to proceed, for the kindly animals were not aware that the plough is the foster-mother of the nobility.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

And indeed through such gates ought to have passed only coaches with gilded underbodies, boxes covered with velvet hammer-cloths, windows with panes of Venetian glass or shutters of Cordova leather; but comedy has its own privileges, and the car of Thespis may enter where it pleases.

A sanded drive, as broad as the bridge itself, led to the castle through a garden laid out in the latest fashion. Carefully clipped boxwood borders outlined plots on which, as on a piece of damask, were displayed scrolls of verdure of perfect symmetry. The gardener's shears did not allow one single leaf to protrude above the others; and nature, rebellious though it was, was compelled to become the humble servant of art. In the centre of each of these compartments rose, in a gallant mythological attitude, the statue of a goddess or of a nymph in the Italianised Flemish style. The background of the verdant designs, that could not have been more accurately traced on paper, was formed of sand of various colours.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

In the middle of the garden a drive, of the same width as the other, crossed it, not at right angles, but ending in an open space the centre of which was formed by a pond, with rockwork that served for pedestal to a child Triton blowing a jet of liquid crystal out of its shell.

The sides of the garden were bounded by palisaded hedges, clipped close, and the foliage of which exhibited the first golden tints of autumn. The trees, which it was difficult to recognise as trees, had been skilfully shaped into an arcaded portico, through the bays of which distant views and prospects over the surrounding country formed a delight for the eyes.

Along the main drive, drawn up like a double row of servants upon the passage of the guests, grew yews, their sombre evergreen foliage clipped into the shape of pyramids, balls, or firepots, alternating one with another.

This display of splendour excited to the highest pitch the wonder and admiration of the players, for seldom indeed had they been privileged to enter so magnificent a domain. Serafina, as she marked these evidences of wealth, made up her mind to cut out the soubrette and not to allow the Marquis to have a love affair with one beneath his condition. The finished coquette considered that this Alcander was hers by right, for since when have maids taken precedence of the mistress? Meantime the soubrette, confident in the effect of her charms, unacknowledged by her own sex but unhesitatingly yielded to by men, already considered herself at home, and not without reason. She reflected that the Marquis had singled her out specially, and that his sudden fondness for the drama was the result of the killing glance she had flashed upon him. Isabella, free from any ambitious views, had turned towards Sigognac, who, through shamefacedness, had seated himself behind her in the chariot, and she was endeavouring to dispel the Baron's involuntary melancholy with one of her faint, sweet smiles. She felt that the contrast between the luxurious Castle of Bruyères and the poverty-stricken towers of Sigognac must necessarily produce a painful impression upon the mind of the impoverished nobleman, whom ill-fortune compelled to follow the adventurous life of a chariot-load of strolling actors; so her tender heart sympathised with the grief of the worthy fellow who in every way deserved a better fate.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

The Tyrant was turning over in his mind, like marbles in a bag, the number of pistoles he intended to claim in payment for the services of his company, and with every revolution of the wheels he added another cipher to the amount. Blazius, the Pedant, licking with his Silenus tongue his lips ever parched with a thirst that nothing could slake, was thinking with concupiscence of the hogsheads, puncheons, and quarter casks of wine of the finest brands which must undoubtedly be stored within the cellars of the mansion. The Leander, while readjusting with a small tortoise-shell comb the locks of his somewhat rumpled wig, asked himself with a beating heart whether the fairy manor-house held perchance a mistress fair. A weighty question of a truth; but the Marquis's haughty and domineering port, jovial though his aspect was, tended to moderate the liberties the actor was already permitting himself, in imagination, to take.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Rebuilt during the course of the late reign, the château of Bruyères closed the prospect at the end of the garden, along the almost entire breadth of which it extended. The style of the architecture recalled that of the mansions in the Place Royale in Paris. A main building, with two wings projecting at right angles so as to form a court of honour, made up a well-thought-out design that was majestic without being dull. The red brick walls, connected at the angles by belting-courses of stone, brought out the windows, also framed in with beautifully dressed white stone, while lintels of the same material marked the separation of the three stories. The keystone of the window-frames represented a chubby-cheeked woman's face, with hair carefully dressed, and smiling with a good-tempered look of welcome. The balcony rails were supported upon swelling balusters. Through the clean, bright panes, lighted up by the rays of the rising sun, was caught a glimpse of long curtains made of rich stuffs.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

By way of varying the lines of the main building, the architect, one of Androuet de Cerceau's clever pupils, had built out a sort of portico in a more ornate style than the rest of the building, and had placed in it the entrance door which was reached by a flight of steps. Two pair of coupled pillars, of the rustic order, with courses alternately square and round, such as may be seen in the paintings of Peter Paul Rubens, who was so frequently employed by Queen Mary de Medici, upbore a cornice, ornamented, like the entrance-gate to the park, with the Marquis's escutcheon. This cornice formed the platform of a broad balcony with stone balustrade, upon which opened the principal window of the great drawing-room. Vermiculated and channelled boss-work adorned the jambs and arch of the doorway, which was closed by two oaken leaves ingeniously carved and varnished, the iron-work of which shone like silver or steel.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The high slate roofs, delicately imbricated and bossed, showed against the clear sky in agreeably correct lines, symmetrically broken by large groups of chimneys, with trophies and other ornaments carved upon each face. Large leaden ornaments, of pleasant fulness, rose upon every gable of the purplish blue roofs on which the sun shone in places. From the chimney-tops, early as the hour was and notwithstanding that the season did not necessarily call for fires, rose little spirals of light smoke, denoting a happy, active, and easy life. The kitchens were already busy in this abbey of Theleme; riding upon robust horses, the keepers were bringing in game for the day's meals; the tenants were coming up with provisions which the kitchen staff was receiving, and footmen were traversing the court bearing orders or on their way to carry them out.

Pleasant indeed to the eye was this castle, the new brick and stone walls of which seemed to have the colours with which health adorns a healthy countenance. It gave the impression of increasing prosperity in full development, but not of a sudden prosperity, such as capricious Fortune, balanced upon its wheel, enjoys bestowing upon her favourites of a day. Beneath the brand-new luxury one felt there was the wealth of years.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Somewhat behind the mansion, on either side of the wings, rose tall, wide-spreading aged trees, the tops of which were already gilded, though the lower foliage was still of a rich green. These trees grew in the vast, shady, broad, lordly park that stretched afar, bearing witness to the foresight and wealth of the owner's ancestors. For while it is true that with money one can run up buildings quickly, it is also true that no money will hasten the growth of trees, the boughs of which slowly increase like those of the genealogical trees of the homes they cover and protect with their shade.

The worthy Sigognac had certainly never felt the venomous fangs of envy striking into his upright heart, and injecting into it that green poison which speedily finds its way into the veins and, borne with the blood to the end of the smallest ducts, ends by corrupting the finest of characters; nevertheless he was unable to wholly repress a sigh as he remembered that of yore the Sigognacs took precedence over the Bruyères, as being of older nobility already well known at the time of the first crusade. The clean, new, spruce mansion, as white and rosy as a maiden's cheeks, adorned with every refinement and luxury, seemed to be an unwittingly cruel satire upon the poor, dilapidated, tumble-down, ruinous manor, decaying in silence and forgetfulness, a regular rats' hole, a nest for owls, a home for spiders, that might at any moment crash down upon the head of its unlucky master that had left it at the eleventh hour to avoid being caught in the smash. The many years of weariness and wretchedness that Sigognac had spent in it passed before him in an attitude of deep despair, their hair covered with ashes, wearing dusty liveries, their arms hanging limp, their mouths gaping with the yawn of dulness. Without feeling jealous of the Marquis, he could not help thinking him a very lucky man.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Sigognac was drawn from his moody thoughts by the chariot stopping short in front of the entrance steps. He threw off, as well as he could, his most unseasonable reflections, dried a tear that was gathering in the corner of his eye, and calmly sprang down to assist Isabella and the other actresses who were bothered by their skirts ballooning up in the morning breeze.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

The Marquis de Bruyères, who had observed the approach of the company from afar, was standing at the top of the entrance-steps, dressed in a tan-coloured jacket and breeches, gray silk hose, and white, square-toed shoes; the whole costume trimmed handsomely with ribbons to match. He descended a few steps of the horse-shoe stairs, like a well-bred host who does not lay too much stress upon the quality of his guests, though the presence of Sigognac justified this piece of politeness. He stopped on the third step, considering it would not be dignified to go lower, and thence made a friendly and protecting gesture to the players.

Just then the maid put out from under the hood her roguish, mischievous face, that stood out against the dark background brilliant with light, wit, and ardour; her eyes and her teeth flashed with equal brilliancy, as she leaned half-way out of the chariot, leaning upon the wooden cross-bar, exhibiting a glimpse of her bosom through the parted folds of her neckerchief, and apparently waiting to be helped out. Sigognac, who was busy aiding Isabella, paid no attention to the feigned embarrassment of the sly minx, who cast upon the Marquis a burning, beseeching glance.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The lord of Bruyères heeded the appeal, descended quickly the last few steps, and approached the vehicle to fulfil his duties of cavalier, his hand outstretched, and his toes turned out like a dancer's. With a swift, coquettish, kittenish motion, the maid sprang to the side of the chariot, hesitated for a second, pretended to lose her balance, threw her arms around the Marquis's neck, and alighted like a bird, scarcely marking the well-raked ground with her little feet.

"Pardon me," she said to the Marquis, affecting a confusion she was far from feeling. "I thought I was going to fall and I clung to your neck as to a branch ; when one is falling or drowning, one catches at anything. Besides, a fall is a bad omen for an actress."

"Permit me to look upon this slight accident in the light of a favour," answered the Marquis, much moved at having felt against his breast the skilfully palpitating bosom of the young woman.

Serafina, her head slightly turned, and her pupil well in the outer corner of her eye, had observed the whole scene almost through the back of her head, with the jealous perspicacity of a rival whom nothing escapes, a power of vision fully equal to Argus's hundred eyes. She could not refrain from biting her lips, Zerbina, such was the soubrette's name, having by a bold and familiar stroke made her way into the good graces of the Marquis, and gaining, so to speak, the honours of the place at the expense of the leading members of the company ; a damnable piece of impudence, subversive of proper stage precedence.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

"Look at the forward slut, who must have a Marquis to help her down," said Serafina to herself in a style not consonant with the mannered and ultra-refined tone she affected in her speech. But women, when vexed, are very apt to make use of billingsgate, whether they be duchesses or thorough-paced coquettes.

"John," said the Marquis to a valet who had approached at a sign from his master, "have the chariot put up in the stable-yard, and the scenery and properties it contains stored carefully in one of the outhouses. See that the trunks of these ladies and gentlemen are carried to the rooms selected by the majordomo, and let my guests be provided with whatever they may need. I desire that they be treated courteously and respectfully. Off with you ! "

Having given these orders, the lord of Bruyères slowly ascended the steps, not without flashing, ere he disappeared within, a lascivious glance at Zerbina, who smiled back at him in much too alluring a manner, in the opinion of Serafina, wroth at the maid's impudence.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The ox-cart, accompanied by the Tyrant, the Pedant, and Scappino, proceeded into a court at the back, and with the assistance of the stable-men a public square, a palace, and a forest, in the shape of three much-rubbed, long drop-scenes, were speedily drawn from the box of the vehicle, as well as candlesticks of antique form, intended for use at nuptial ceremonies, a gilt wooden cup, a tin dagger, the blade of which slipped back into the handle, skeins of red thread used to represent blood in wounds, a poison vial, an urn for ashes, and other properties indispensable in tragic endings of plays.

A strolling actors' chariot holds a small world, and, indeed, is not the stage a miniature world and the very microcosm philosophers dream of finding? Does it not contain within itself the totality of things and the diverse conditions of man visibly represented by suitable fictions? Are not the old worn-out costumes, covered with dust, stained with oil and tallow, braided with rusty imitation gold lace, the stars of orders of knight-hood in rolled gold and Rhinestones, the antique swords with brass sheaths and blunted iron blades, the helmets and diadems in Greek or Roman shapes, are not these like the cast-off garments of mankind in which the heroes of bygone ages dress themselves up to live again for a moment in the glare of the footlights? These poor treasures, in which the poet is content to dress up his fancies, and that suffice him, with the illusion of the lighting and the prestige of the speech of the gods to enchant the most difficult to please of spectators, would no doubt have been looked at with contempt by a narrow-minded and prosaic person.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

The Marquis de Bruyères' servants, true domestics of a great house and as insolent as though themselves aristocrats, reluctantly handled, with an air of disdain, these stage rags they helped to store in the out-house, arranging them as directed by the Tyrant, who was the stage manager of the company. They considered it rather degrading to be set to attend upon strolling players, but the Marquis had spoken, and there was nothing for it but to obey, for he ill brooked rebellion and was as lavish of thrashings as an Eastern potentate.

With as respectful a mien as though he were approaching genuine kings and princesses, the majordomo came, cap in hand, to take the orders of the comedians and to show them to their respective rooms. The apartments intended for the visitors to Bruyères were situated in the left wing of the mansion. They were reached by beautiful stairs of rubbed white stone, with frequent landings and resting-places, and led into long corridors, floored with black and white slabs in the form of checker-work, lighted by windows at each end. The various rooms opened into these halls, each room being distinguished by the colour of the portière, which was also that of the hangings within, so as to enable the guests to recognise their own chamber easily. There was a Yellow Room, a Red Room, a Green Room, a Blue Room, a Gray Room, a Tapestry Room, a Bohemian leather Room, a Wainscotted Room, a Frescoed Room, and such others as my reader chooses to invent, for the longer enumeration of them would prove fastidious and would come better from a house-decorator than from a writer.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Every one of the rooms was handsomely furnished and provided with luxuries as well as with conveniences. The Tapestry Room, most amorously adorned with voluptuous love scenes drawn from mythology, in the form of rich hangings, was assigned to Zerbina the maid; Isabella was lodged in the Blue Room, the colour of which was becoming to her fair complexion ; the Red had been set apart for Serafina, while the Brown Room was given to the duenna, its sober and almost grim aspect being considered suited to the age of the lady. Sigognac was installed in the Bohemian leather Room, not far from Isabella's, a delicate attention on the part of the Marquis. This fine room was given to important guests only, and the master of Bruyères desired to mark the fact that a man of rank was with the players, and to prove to him that he respected his position as well as his incognito. The other members of the company, the Tyrant, the Pedant, the Hector, Scapino, and Leander were assigned to the remaining chambers.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

When Sigognac entered the room allotted to him, and in which his modest travelling equipage had been placed, he mused upon the strangeness of his fortunes and at the same time gazed in surprise upon the apartment he was to occupy during his stay in the castle, for never before had he been so well lodged. The walls, as the name of the room indicated, were hung with Bohemian leather goffered with fanciful flowers and extravagant foliage ; the gilded ground brought out the corollas, scrolls, and leaves ornamented with colours the metallic reflections of which shone like spangles, forming hangings as rich as they were clean, and that covered the walls from the cornice down to the black oak wainscoting admirably divided into panels, lozenges, and compartments.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The window-curtains were of red and yellow brocattelle to match the ground of the hangings and the prevailing colour in the design. The bedstead, the head of which was placed against the wall and the foot of which extended into the apartment, so as to leave space on either side, was upholstered with the same stuff.

Square-backed chairs, with twisted legs, starred with gilt-headed nails and trimmed with fringe, and arm-chairs opening out their well-stuffed arms, were ranged along the wainscoting in the expectation of visitors and marked that close and friendly talk went on in the chimney corner. The mantelpiece, of white Serancolin marble, spotted with red, stood high, broad, and deep. A fire, most pleasant upon that cool morning, was blazing in seasonable fashion, lighting up with its bright reflections the back-plate ornamented with the Marquis's escutcheon. On the shelf, a small clock, in the form of a pavilion the dome of which was formed by the gong, marked the hours upon a dial of inlaid silver, openworked in the centre and allowing the works within to be seen.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

A table, with legs twisted like pillars of the Salomonic order, and covered with a Turkish cloth, occupied the centre of the room. In front of the window stood a dressing-table with a bevelled Venetian mirror upon a guipure cloth covered with the coquettish arsenal of the toilet.

As he gazed in the clear mirror, richly set in a framework of tortoise-shell and pewter, the poor Baron could not help considering himself a most forlorn and pitiable-looking object. The elegance of the room, the newness and freshness of the objects that surrounded him, rendered still more striking the ridiculousness and poverty of a dress that had been old-fashioned even in the days of the late King. Though he was alone, the Baron's thin cheeks mantled with a faint blush; until then his poverty had struck him as regrettable; now it looked grotesque, and for the first time he was ashamed of it. Not a very philosophical state of mind, no doubt, but quite excusable in a young man.

Wishing to attire himself to somewhat better advantage, Sigognac undid the parcel in which Peter had wrapped up the few habiliments his master owned. He shook out the various vestments it contained, but found nothing to satisfy him. Either the doublet was too short or the trunk-hose was too long; the elbows and the knees, being more exposed to wear, were shiny and threadbare; the seams gaped in many a place, the thread showing prominently; and the poor clothes, discoloured by sun, wind, and rain, had acquired such undecided hues that a painter would have been puzzled to fit names to them. Nor was the linen any better, repeated laundrying having reduced it to a condition of extreme tenuity. The shirts looked like the ghosts of such garments rather than real shirts, and had the air of having been cut out of the cobwebs in Sigognac Castle. To top all, the rats, finding nothing to eat in the pantry, had gnawed some of the least worn-out, and had adorned them with as much openwork as a lace collar, a needless piece of ornamentation the poor Baron would willingly have dispensed with.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Sigognac was so absorbed in his doleful inspection that he failed to hear a very discreet knock at his door which half opened and gave passage first to Master Blazius' rubicund nose, and next to his obese form. As he entered the room he made innumerable exaggerated bows, servilely comic or comically servile, denoting respect, half genuine, half feigned.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

When the Pedant came up to Sigognac the latter was holding up to the light, by the two sleeves, a shirt traceried like the rose window in a cathedral, and shaking his head with an air of pitiful discouragement.

“By Bacchus!” said the Pedant, whose voice startled the Baron taken unawares, “that is a brave and victorious-looking shirt. One would swear it had been worn by the great god Mars himself on the occasion of the storming of some fortress, so gloriously riddled, perforated, and filled with holes is it by musketry, cross-bow bolts, javelins, cloth-yard shafts, and other ballistic weapons. Do not blush for it, Baron; these holes are mouths that tell of honour won, while the finest and newest linen of Frisia or Holland, pleated in the latest Court fashion, often covers the infamy of some newly enriched, fraudulent, and simoniacal rascal. Many a hero, famous in story, was poorly off for linen; Ulysses, for instance, who, grave, prudent, subtile though he was, did present himself wearing a handful of seaweed only to the most fair Princess Nausicaa, as may be read in Master Homer’s Odyssey.”

“Unfortunately,” replied Sigognac, “my dear Bla-

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

zius, my only likeness to the brave Greek, King of Ithaca, is that I also am lacking in linen, while my present poverty is not compensated for by anterior exploits. I have had no opportunity to display my valour, and I do not believe I shall ever be sung by poets. I am bound to say, although one ought not to be ashamed of honourable poverty, that I feel ashamed at having to appear in company thus accoutred. The Marquis of Bruyères recognised me, though he keeps the fact to himself, and he might betray my secret."

"Very unfortunate indeed," replied the Pedant; "but there is a cure for everything save death, as the old saw has it. We poor players, shadows of human life and ghosts of people of every rank, — we have at least the appearance if we have not the reality of things, and the two are as alike as the reflection of an object is like the object itself. Thanks to our wardrobe, which contains all our kingdoms, patrimonies, and lordships, we may, when we please, assume the dress of princes, great barons, and noblemen of proud port and lofty mien. For a few hours we are as bravely attired as the foppiest; dandies and bucks imitate our borrowed elegance which they transform into reality, substituting fine cloth for serge, real gold for imitation, diamonds for Rhinestones, for the stage is the school of manners and the academy of fashion. As costumer to the company, I can turn a dastard into an Alexander, a penniless devil into a rich lord, a street girl into a great lady. If you will not take it ill, I shall turn my resources to account in your favour, for since you have been kind enough to cast in your lot with us wanderers, you ought at least to make use of us. Throw off that livery of melancholy and poverty that clouds your natural advantages and fills you with unjustifiable mistrust of yourself. I happen to have in reserve in one of my boxes a very neat black velvet dress, trimmed with flame-coloured ribbon, which is not in the least stagey and might be worn by a courtier, for authors and poets nowadays are very fond of putting on the stage contemporary events, under fictitious names, and for this purpose we must have costumes of well-bred people and not of strollers extravagantly disguised in antique or romanesque fashion. I have the chemisette, the silk stockings, the shoes with bows, the mantle, and all the accessories of the costume, which seems to have been cut out purposely to your size as if in anticipation of this adventure. There is nothing wanting, not even the sword."

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“As for that, there is no need of it,” said Sigognac, with a haughty gesture that betrayed the full pride of the noble that no misfortune can diminish. “I have my father’s sword.”

“Care for it preciously,” returned Blazius, “for a sword is a faithful friend that guards its master’s life and honour. It does not forsake him in times of disaster, perils, and ugly encounters, as do flatterers, the vile, parasitical product of prosperity. Our stage swords have neither edge nor point, for they are intended to inflict feigned wounds only, that are cured by the end of the play, and without the use of unguents, lint, or therakia. Your own sword will defend you at need, as it already did when the scarecrow bandit worked off his grim and laughable highway robbery. But suffer me to fetch the clothes from the box in which they are put away; I long to see the chrysalis turn into a butterfly.”

Having spoken these words with his customary grotesque grandiloquence, which he made use of in ordinary life as well as in his stage parts, the Pedant left the room and returned shortly afterwards carrying in his arms a parcel of fair size, wrapped up in a napkin, which he respectfully placed on the table.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

“If you will put up with an old comic Pedant for a valet,” said Blazius, rubbing his hands with satisfaction, “I shall prink and curl you in fine fashion. Every lady will forthwith fall in love with you, for, be it said without offence to the Sigognac cookery, you have fasted long enough in your Tower of Hunger to turn into the very image of a man dying of love. Women believe in the passion of thin men only; corpulent fellows have no chance with them, even did they bear in their mouths the golden chains, symbolic of eloquence, which bound nobles, merchants, and villeins to the lips of Ogmios, the Gallic Hercules. That is the reason, and the sole reason, why I have had but scant success with the fair sex and soon turned to the bottle divine, which is not so particular and favourably welcomes stout men as capable of holding more drink.”

Thus did worthy Blazius endeavour to brighten up Baron de Sigognac while engaged in dressing him, for the volubility of his tongue in no wise impaired the deftness of his hands, and even at the risk of being rated for a chatterer and a bore, he thought it better to stun the young nobleman with his flow of words than to allow him to relapse into his moody reflections.

The Baron's toilet was speedily completed, for the player's art involving rapid changes of costume, actors acquire much dexterity in accomplishing these metamorphoses. Blazius, satisfied with his work, led Baron de Sigognac by the tips of the fingers, just as a bride is led to the altar, to the Venice mirror placed upon the toilet table, and said to him : —

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“If your lordship will now kindly look at your lordship.”

Sigognac saw in the mirror an image that he at first supposed to be that of some one else, so different was it from his own appearance. He involuntarily turned his head and looked over his shoulder to see if there were not perchance some one behind him. The image reflected his own motion. There could not be any doubt of it, it was he himself; not the wan, sad, pitiful Sigognac that had become almost ridiculous, so wretched was he, but a young, elegant, splendid Sigognac, whose old clothes, cast on the floor, resembled the dull gray skins shed by caterpillars when, as butterflies with wings of gold, cinnabar, and lapis-lazuli, they fly upwards into the heavens. The unknown being who had been imprisoned in that dilapidated casing, had suddenly emerged from it and now shone resplendent under the clear light streaming in through the window, like a statue which has just been unveiled in some public function. Sigognac saw himself in the guise in which he had occasionally beheld himself in his dreams, a participant, as well as an onlooker, in an imaginary scene occurring within his castle, rebuilt and decorated by the clever architects of dream-land, to receive an adored Infanta riding upon a white palfrey. A smile of pride and triumph flitted for an instant like a purple flush upon his pale lips, and his youth, so long buried beneath the weight of misfortune, showed up again upon his improved features.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Blazius, standing by the toilet-table, was observing his handiwork, drawing back in order to take it in better, like a painter who has just given the last touch to a picture with which he feels satisfied.

"If, as I hope, you make your way at Court and regain your estates, you will have to give me the post of superintendent of your wardrobe, and enable me to retire from the stage," said he, mimicking the bow of a suitor as he stood before the metamorphosed Baron.

"I take note of your request," answered Sigognac, with a melancholy smile. "You are the first human creature, Master Blazius, that ever has asked me for anything."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“After dinner, which we are to have in private, we are to call upon the Marquis for the purpose of showing him a list of the plays we can perform, and to learn from him in what part of the mansion we are to set up our stage. You shall pass for the poet attached to the company, for there are plenty wits in the provinces who from time to time follow in Thalia’s train in hopes of winning the heart of some actress or other. The Isabella is a pretty pretext, the more so that she is clever, beautiful, and virtuous. Girls taking her style of parts often play more naturally than the empty-headed and frivolous public imagine.”

Whereupon the Pedant, though not conceited, withdrew to attend to his own toilet.

The handsome Leander, still thinking of the lady of the castle, was adorning himself to the best of his ability, in hopes of meeting at last with the impossible intrigue he was constantly in search of, and that, according to Scappino, had so far won him only disappointments and thrashings. As for the actresses, to whom the Marquis de Bruyères had civilly sent pieces of silk dress-stuff, so that they might, if needed, make themselves gowns for their parts, it will easily be believed that they made use of every means to which art has recourse in order to adorn nature, and that they got themselves up to kill, so far as their meagre ward-robres of strolling players allowed them to do so.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Every one being ready, the company repaired to the dining-room, where the repast was served.

Naturally impatient, the Marquis joined the players at table ere the meal was ended. He would not suffer them to rise, and when the ewer and basin had been passed round, he asked the Tyrant what plays they knew.

"All those of the late Hardy," replied the Tyrant, in his cavernous voice: "'Pyramus,' by Théophile de Viaux, 'Sylvia,' 'Chriseides,' 'Sylvanira,' 'Cardenio's Folly,' 'The Faithless Confidant,' 'Phyllis of Scyra,' 'Lygdamon,' 'The Deceiver Punished,' 'The Widow,' 'The Ring of Forgetfulness,' and whatever has been produced by the prettiest wits of the day."

"For some years past I have lived away from the Court, and I am not familiar with the latest novelties," said the Marquis, modestly. "I should find it difficult to judge between so many excellent plays, most of which are unknown to me. I am of opinion that it will be best to trust to your own judgment, which, backed by both theory and practice, cannot be at fault."

"We have often performed a play," replied the

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Tyrant, "that might not perhaps stand being printed and read, but which has always proved most successful in exciting the hearty laughter of our best society by its by-play, its comic repartees, its jokes, and horse-play."

"Then do not look for any other," answered the Marquis de Bruyères. "And pray what is that blessed masterpiece called?"

"The Rodomontades of Captain Hector."

"A capital title, by my faith! Has the maid a good part?" added the Marquis, flashing a glance at Zerbina.

"The daintiest and most roguish of parts, and she plays it to perfection; it is her greatest success. She has always won triumphs in it, and without the aid of a cabal or of paid applauders either."

At this managerial compliment, Zerbina believed it her duty to blush slightly, difficult as it was to make her brown cheeks redden; modesty, that inward rouge, was something she did not possess, and would have been looked for in vain among the cosmetics upon her dressing-table. She cast down her eyes, thus bringing to notice her long dark lashes, and raised her hand as if to protest against words she felt to be too flattering. The gesture drew attention to a small and shapely, if somewhat brown, hand, the little finger coquettishly apart from the others and the rosy nails shining like agates, having been polished with powdered coral and chamois leather.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Zerbina looked fetching just then. The feigned modesty she affected gives spice to genuine depravation, and tickles libertines, even though they are not duped by it, by the piquancy of the contrast. The Marquis fixed upon the soubrette the hot glance of the connoisseur, while he treated the other women in the company with the mere vague civility of a well-bred man who has made up his mind.

“He did not even inquire what sort of a part the leading lady has,” thought Serafina, with intense annoyance. “It is outrageous, and that wealthy nobleman strikes me as singularly devoid of discernment, politeness, and good taste. He is unquestionably a man of low inclinations. His life in the provinces has spoiled him, and his habitual courting of scullion wenches and herd-girls has wholly destroyed any sense of delicacy he ever possessed.”

These reflections did not conduce to make Serafina look amiable. Her features were regular, but somewhat hard, and in order to attract required to be softened by the studied grace of her smiles and her fluttering eyelids. When contracted, as they were at that moment, they were harsh and grumpy. She was unquestionably more beautiful than Zerbina, but there was something aggressive, haughty, and spiteful in her expression. Even had love ventured, fancy would have flown away terrified.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Consequently the Marquis withdrew without having attempted the least flirtation with Serafina or Isabella, the latter of whom, besides, he looked upon as on intimate terms with Sigognac. Before going out, he said to the Tyrant : —

“ I have ordered the orangery to be cleared out for you ; it is the largest hall in the house, and you can set up your stage there. Trestles, boards, hangings, seats, and whatever else is needed for an improvised performance have been taken there. Pray oversee the workmen, who are very inexpert in such matters ; work them as a galley slave-driver works his gang ; they will obey you as they would me.”

One of the servants conducted the Tyrant, Blazius, and Scappino to the orangery, for they it was who usually looked after the ordering of these matters. The hall was admirably adapted to a dramatic performance, owing to its oblong shape, which allowed of the stage being set up at one of the ends, and of filling up the vacant space with rows of arm-chairs, chairs, stools, and benches, according to the rank of the spectators and the honour it was desired to pay them. The walls were painted with a green trellis-work upon a blue ground, and represented a rustic architecture, with pillars, arcades, niches, domes, and low vaulting, all in excellent perspective and wreathed round with light foliage and flowers for the purpose of breaking the monotony of the lozenges and the straight lines. The partially arched ceiling represented the sky veined with a few white clouds and spotted with brightly-coloured birds. The whole formed a decoration entirely appropriate to the novel use about to be made of the place.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

At one end of the hall a slightly sloping flooring was laid upon trestles, and wooden uprights, intended to support the wings, were set up on either side. Great curtains of tapestry, running upon cords tightly stretched, were to act as a curtain and to be gathered in to right and left on opening like the folds of a proscenium curtain. The frieze was formed of a strip of stuff cut in vandykes, like the trimming of a bed-tester, and completed the framing in of the stage.

While the stage is being constructed, it may be well to say something of the inhabitants of the castle. I have forgotten to state that the Marquis de Bruyères was married, but I may be forgiven for this, seeing how little he remembered the fact himself. Love, it need hardly be said, had not made the match, which had been brought about because the two contracting parties were equally noble and equally possessed of landed property. After a very brief honeymoon, the Marquis and the Marchioness, like well-bred people who felt uncommonly little drawn to each other, had not foolishly striven to attain impossible happiness. By common unspoken consent, they gave up the idea, and lived apart, though under the same roof, in the most courteous way imaginable and enjoying the utmost freedom compatible with decorum. It must not be inferred from this that the Marchioness de Bruyères was either plain or disagreeable; such was not the case, and though a husband may see nothing to admire, a lover may find much to delight, for love is blind, if marriage is very clear-sighted. Besides, I shall introduce my reader to the Marchioness in person, so that he may judge of her merits for himself.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The Marchioness had her own apartments, into which the Marquis never entered without having himself announced. The bedroom was very large, high-ceiled, and sumptuously decorated. The walls were covered with Flanders tapestries, rich, soft, and warm in tone, representing the adventures of Apollo. Curtains of crimson Indian damask fell in heavy folds adown the windows and when traversed by the bright beams of light had the purple transparency of rubies. The bedstead was upholstered with the same material, the breadths of which, marked by gallöons, formed sharply broken folds that shimmered in the light. The tester was furnished with a lambrequin like that on the dais, and at the four corners rose great plumes of carnation-coloured feathers. The chimney-piece projected considerably into the room and rose to the ceiling, showing quite plainly, though hung with arras. A tall Venice mirror in a rich crystal frame, the facets and bevels of which sparkled with prismatic light, leaned downwards from the moulding as if to greet those who approached it. On the andirons, formed of superimposed bulbous forms topped by a huge ball of polished metal, blazed and crackled two or three logs that might well have done service as Yule-logs, but the heat they gave out was by no means superfluous at that season and in view of the size of the apartment.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Two cabinets of quaint design, with small pillars of lapis-lazuli and inlaying of ornamental stones, with secret drawers into which the Marquis would not have pried even had he known how to open them, were placed symmetrically on either side of a dressing-table in front of which Madame de Bruyères was seated in one of those armchairs peculiar to the time of Louis XIII., the back of which, at the height of the shoulders, is formed of an upholstered board trimmed with fringe.

Behind the Marchioness stood a couple of tiring-maids, offering her, the one a paper of pins, the other a box of patches.

Her ladyship, although she owned to being twenty-eight years of age, might well be over thirty; but how much over no one, not even the Marchioness herself, could have told, so ingeniously had she muddled up her chronology. Historians most expert in settling dates would have turned gray in the attempt to get at her true age.

She was a brunette whose complexion had been improved by the plumpness that comes after maidenhood. The olive tones of the thin girl face, that she had been wont to rectify with pearl white and powdered talc, had been replaced by a mat whiteness, somewhat sickly in the daylight, but dazzling by candlelight. The oval form of her face had filled out without losing anything of its noble contours; her chin melted into her neck by a plump and still graceful curve. Though somewhat too aquiline for feminine beauty, her nose was fine and separated two prominent light-brown eyes, which acquired an air of wonderment through the eyebrows being rather far above the eyes themselves.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Her long black hair had just been dressed by her maid, who must have had a difficult task to perform, if one might judge by the number of curl-papers scattered on the carpet round the dressing-table. A row of small ringlets in the form of love-locks, framed in her face and were crimped at the roots of a mass of hair brushed back to the chignon, while two large bandeaus, lightened up, fluffed out, and crimped with swift, sharp touches of the comb, puffed out on either side her cheeks that they rendered more graceful. A bow of ribbon trimmed with jet set off the thick coil twisted on the back of her neck. The Marchioness' hair was one of her chief charms, and was so abundant that it might be dressed in any fashion without recourse to switches and wigs, and her ladyship therefore was always ready to receive visitors of either sex while she was in the hands of her tiring-women.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The nape of the neck led the glance down a full, swelling contour to uncommonly white and plump shoulders, left bare by the low-cut bodice, and made the more attractive by two alluring dimples in their plumpness. The bosom, compressed by the whalebone waist, tended to press together the two half-globes which poetic flatterers, writers of madrigals and sonnets, insist on calling the hostile brothers, although they are but too frequently reconciled, differing in this respect from the brothers in the Thebaid.

A black silk cord, on which was strung a ruby heart and from which depended a small cross of precious stones, was passed round her ladyship's neck, as if with the intention of combating the pagan sensuality excited by the display of her well-exposed charms, and to forbid profane desires from approaching the bosom but ill defended by the slight protection of the lace.

Over a white satin underskirt Madame de Bruyères wore an overskirt of dark garnet silk, trimmed with black ribbons and quilted with jet, with wristlets or cuffs like the gauntlets of men-at-arms.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Jane, one of the Marchioness' women, handed her the box of patches, the final touch of the toilet that no lady of fashion at that time would have dispensed with. Madame de Bruyères put one near the corner of her mouth and then spent much time wondering where she would place the other, called "the heart-breaker," because even the most resolutely cold cannot defend themselves from its allurements. The maids, apparently perceiving the seriousness of the situation, remained motionless and repressed their breathing in order not to interrupt the coquettish reflections of their mistress. At last the wavering finger stopped, and a patch of taffeta, a dark star upon a heaven of whiteness, marked like a birthmark the curve of the left breast. It was a way of saying in amorous hieroglyphs that the road to the lips was through the heart.

Satisfied with her appearance, the Marchioness rose and moved out into the room after casting a last glance at the Venice mirror sloping over the dressing-table. But she turned at once, perceiving she lacked something, went back to the table, and drew from a casket a large watch, a Nuremberg egg, as it was called at that time, richly enamelled in diverse colours, enriched with brilliants and hung on a chain with a hook by means of which she fastened it to her girdle near a little hand-mirror set in a silver-gilt frame.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“Your ladyship is looking particularly well to-day,” said Jane, in a caressing tone. “Your ladyship’s hair is dressed to great advantage, and the gown is most becoming.”

“Do you think so?” returned the Marchioness, drawling out her words with absent-minded nonchalance. “It seems to me, on the contrary, that I am looking my worst. My eyes are sunken, and the shade of my dress makes me look stout. Suppose I were to put on black? What think you, Jane? Black, you know, makes one seem thinner.”

“If your ladyship wishes it, I can dress your ladyship in the blackbird’s tail taffeta gown or in the plum-bloom one; it will not take me a minute, but I should be afraid of spoiling a costume that becomes your ladyship so well.”

“Well, it shall be your fault, Jane, if I put Love to flight and do not gather in this evening my harvest of hearts. Has the Marquis invited many guests to see this play?”

“A number of messengers have gone off on horse-back in different directions. There is sure to be a numerous company ; people will come from all the seats in the neighbourhood, for there are so few opportunities of enjoyment in this part of the country."

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

"That is true," said the Marchioness, with a sigh. "We have to put up with a dreadful dearth of pleasures. And what about the actors themselves, Jane? Have you seen them? Are any of them young, handsome, and of gallant bearing?"

"I can scarcely tell your ladyship, for these people have masks rather than faces ; powder, rouge, and wigs make them look well on the stage and give them a totally different appearance. Yet it struck me that there was one who did not look too ragged and who assumes the air of a cavalier. He has fine teeth and a handsome leg."

"He must be the leading lover, Jane," returned the Marchioness. "They always select for that part the handsomest fellow in the company, for it would never do for a knock-kneed man with a turned-up nose to talk sentiment and fall on his knees to declare his love."

"Yes, indeed, it would be very unseemly," said the maid, laughing. "A husband need not be much to look at, but lovers have to be perfection itself."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“That is why I am fond of those stage gallants, who use flowery language, who are expert in dwelling on fine sentiments, who swoon at the feet of a hard-hearted mistress, who call Heaven to witness, curse fate, draw their sword to thrust themselves through, who breathe fire and flames like volcanoes of love, and say things that cause the severest virtue to fall into ecstasy. Their speeches are a delight to my heart, and at times I think they are addressed to me. Often, indeed, the lady’s refusals irritate me, and I scold her inwardly for making so true a lover pine and languish the way she does.”

“That is because your ladyship is so kind-hearted,” returned the maid, “and hates to see people suffer. For my part, I am of a more cruel disposition, and it would please me greatly to see a man die of love for me. Fine talk has never yet had any effect upon me.”

“You are practical, Jane, and your mind is somewhat gross. You do not, as I do, read novels and plays. Did you not say just now that the leading lover in this company is a handsome fellow?”

“Your ladyship can judge for herself,” said the maid, who was standing by the window, “for he is even now crossing the court, no doubt on his way to the orangery, where the stage is being set up.”

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

The Marchioness drew near the window, and saw the Leander walking slowly, sunk in thought, like a man a prey to an all-consuming passion. In order to be ready for any chance that might occur, he affected an air of unrequited passion that ever awakens the interest of the sex, which so readily divines that there is a heart to be comforted. As he came by the balcony, he looked up in a particular way so as to make his eyes shine, looked long, sadly, and despairingly at the window, as though the victim of hopeless love, though he took care to express at the same time the liveliest and most respectful admiration. On perceiving the Marchioness, who was pressing her face against the pane, he took off his hat, swept the ground with the feather, and made one of those deep bows such as one makes to queens and to divinities, and that mark the distance that exists between the Empyrean and nothingness. Then he put on his hat again with a most graceful gesture, resuming with a proud air his arrogant cavalier mien that for an instant he had laid at the feet of the fair. It was done in clean, sharp, admirable fashion. A genuine nobleman, used to the ways of the world and a frequenter of courts, could not have hit more happily on just the right touch.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Flattered by this salute, at once discreet and submissive, which paid so well the deference due to her rank, Madame de Bruyères could not refrain from replying to it by a slight inclination of the head accompanied by a faint smile.

These favourable signs were not lost on the Leander, and his native conceit forthwith exaggerated their importance. He did not for a moment doubt that the Marchioness had fallen in love with him, and his extravagant imagination straightway set to work to build up a whole romance on this slight basis. He was at last about to realise the dream of his life, to have a love intrigue with a real lady of the world, in an almost princely mansion, he, a poor country actor, full of talent assuredly, but who had never yet played before the Court. Filled with these fancies, he was overwhelmed with delight; his bosom swelled, his heart beat high, and as soon as the rehearsal was over, he returned to his room to indite a note in the most hyperbolical style, which he intended to get to the Marchioness in some way or other.

As every member of the company already knew his or her part, the performance of "The Rodomontades of Captain Hector" began as soon as the Marquis's guests had arrived.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

The orangery, transformed into a theatre, looked very attractive. Clusters of wax tapers, fixed to the walls by brackets and plates, shed a soft light that enabled the dresses of the ladies to be properly seen, without, at the same time, interfering with the scenic effect. At the back of the spectators had been placed, on boards arranged in the form of steps, the orange-trees, the flowers and foliage of which, warmed by the pleasant temperature of the hall, gave out the most suave of scents that mingled with the perfumes of musk, benzoin, amber, and iris.

In the front row, close to the stage, in great arm-chairs, sat in radiant beauty Yolande de Foix, the Duchess of Montalban, the Baroness of Hagémeau, the Marchioness de Bruyères, and other ladies of quality, in toilets so rich and elegant that it was plain not one of them meant to be surpassed by any of the others. There was a wealth of velvet, satin, gold and silver stuffs, lace, guipure, gold and silver embroidery, diamond drops, pearl necklaces, aigrettes, pendants of gems that sparkled in the light and cast dazzling beams, to say nothing of the still more brilliant flashes of the lovely eyes of the women. Even at Court it would have been impossible to see a more splendid gathering.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

If Yolande de Foix had not been present, there were a number of mortal deities who would have caused a Paris charged with awarding the golden apple to hesitate, but her presence rendered any rivalry impossible. Yet she did not resemble indulgent Venus so much as merciless Diana. The young lady was cruelly beautiful, implacably graceful, despairingly perfect. Her long delicate face seemed to be of agate or onyx rather than of flesh, so pure, ideal, and noble were her features. Her exquisitely turned neck, as flexible as a swan's, was joined by a pure contour to shoulders still somewhat thin and to a youthful bosom, white as snow, which did not heave responsive to the beating of her heart. Her lips, shaped like the goddess's bow, flashed mockery even when she remained silent, and the glance of her cold blue eye disconcerted the coolest attacks. Nevertheless she was irresistibly attractive; her whole person, so insolently splendid, provoked desire to impossibilities. No man could see Yolande without falling in love with her, but few ventured to caress the dream of being loved in return.

How was she dressed? It would take a cooler mind than mine to answer the question! Her garments floated around her like a luminous mist in which she alone was discernible, but I believe she had strings of pearls in her hair that mingled with the golden curls shining like an aureole.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Behind the ladies were seated, on stools and benches, the noblemen and gentlemen who were the fathers, husbands, or brothers of these beauties. Some bent gracefully over the backs of the arm-chairs and whispered compliments into willing ears; others were fanning themselves with the plumes of their beavers, and others again, standing up, one hand on the hip, and in an attitude calculated to show off their fine figure, were casting a self-satisfied look over the company. A hum of conversation hovered over all like a light mist, and the spectators were just growing impatient when three blows solemnly struck sounded in the hall and at once secured silence.

The curtains parted slowly, and revealed the stage set to represent a public square, an undefined sort of place, convenient for the intrigues and the encounters of primitive comedy. It was a carfax, with houses with pointed gables, projecting stories, small windows set in lead, and chimneys from which naïvely rose corkscrews of smoke that ascended to melt into the clouds of a sky that careful dusting had failed to make as bright as it had originally been. One of the houses standing at the corner of two streets that made desperate efforts to produce an effect of perspective by driving through the canvas, was furnished with a practicable door and window. The two side-scenes, connected by flies representing the sky and spotted in many a place with oil, were similarly furnished, one of them having, in addition, a balcony that could be ascended by means of a ladder concealed from the spectators, an arrangement that lent itself well to conversations and escalades and elopements after the Spanish fashion. As may be seen, the stage of the little company was well stocked, considering the period. It is true that the painting of the scenery would have struck a connoisseur as somewhat rough and rudimentary; the tiles on the roofs drew the eye by their crude red tones; the foliage of the trees planted in front of the houses was of the most vivid verdigris, and the blue of the sky was of the most impossible azure, but the general effect was that of a public square, if only the spectators were good-natured enough to see it.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

A row of twenty-four carefully snuffed candles cast a strong light upon the scenery, that was quite unused to such a brilliant illumination, and the splendour of it was greeted with a murmur of satisfaction by the audience.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

The play opened with a quarrel between the worthy townsman Pandolfo and his daughter Isabella, who, because she had fallen in love with a fair-haired young man, obstinately refused to wed Captain Hector, with whom her father was infatuated. Zerbina, her maid, in the pay of Leander, stood by her through thick and thin, the impudent minx, quick at repartee, replying to the insults Pandolfo hurled at her with unceasing jeers and nonsense, and advising him to wed the hectoring captain himself since he was so fond of him. But as far as she was concerned, she would never suffer her young mistress to become the spouse of a dotard fit only to be slapped and set up in a vineyard to serve as a scarecrow. Whereat the old gentleman, exploding with rage, and wishing to talk to Isabella in private, tried to drive Zerbina home, but she would swing round as the old fellow pushed her and remain just where she was before, and this with such an easy swing of the waist, so naughty a twist of the hips, so coquettish a switching of her skirts, that a professional ballet-dancer could not have improved upon it. At every new attempt on the part of Pandolfo to get rid of her, she laughed out, apparently caring little that her mouth was large, and exhibited her pearl-like teeth, more dazzling than ever in the light, in a way to make even Heraclitus himself laugh. Her eyes, made brighter by a touch of powder under the lids, sparkled like diamonds; her lips were rouged, and her brand-new skirts, made out of the taffeta presented to her by the Marquis, shimmered and gleamed where they fell in folds and seemed to scatter sparks around.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The whole company applauded her performance, and the Marquis de Bruyères said to himself that he had not erred in picking out this pearl among soubrettes.

A new character now appeared, looking to right and left as if fearing to be surprised. It was Leander, the terror of fathers, husbands, guardians, the beloved of wives, daughters, and wards; the lover, in a word; the man dreamed of, expected, and looked for, who is to fulfil the promises of the ideal, realise the fancies of the poet, the playwright, and the novelist; who is to prove to be youth, love, and happiness; who suffers from none of the disadvantages of humanity, who is never hungry, thirsty, hot, cold, afraid, tired, or ill, but ever ready, night and day, to sigh, to murmur declarations of love, to win over duennas, to bribe maids, to climb ladders, to draw when surprised or meeting a rival, and, in addition, who is always clean-shaven, dainty in his dress and a wearer of fine linen, with side-long glance and heart in the shape of Cupid's bow.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Perceiving Pandolfo where he had expected to meet Isabella only, Leander stopped and assumed an attitude he had carefully rehearsed in front of his mirror, well aware that it brought out to great advantage the fine points of his figure. The weight of his body resting upon his left leg, his right slightly bent, one hand on the hilt of his sword, the other used to caress his chin so as to show off the famous diamond solitaire ring, his glance laden with fire and languor, his lips parted by a faint smile that allowed his teeth to show, he looked really very well. His costume, renovated with fresh ribbons, his dazzlingly white linen puffing out between his doublet and his trunk-hose, his narrow, high-heeled shoes, adorned with a big rosette, contributed to give him the mien of a thorough cavalier.

Consequently he at once won the ladies, and the mocking Yolande herself did not think him ridiculous. Turning to account his mute by-play, Leander flashed across the foot-lights a seductive glance that he let fall upon the Marchioness with so passionate and beseech-ing an expression that she blushed in spite of herself, then he turned it upon Isabella, carelessly and lacking lustre, as if to emphasise the difference between real love and the mere imitation of it.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The sight of Leander turned Pandolfo's wrath to exasperation. He dismissed his daughter and Zerbina to their lodging, not quickly enough, however, to prevent the latter slipping into her pocket a note addressed to Isabella, in which the lover asked for a meeting at night. The young gentleman, left alone with Pandolfo, assured him in the politest fashion that his intentions were strictly honourable, that he aimed at forming the most sacred of connections; that he was well born, well thought of by the great, and in good standing at Court. Further, that nothing, not even death itself, could part him from Isabella, whom he loved more than his life, words which the young lady, bending over the balcony and making signs of acquiescence, drank in with delight. Notwithstanding Leander's mellifluous eloquence, Pandolfo, with obstinate senile infatuation, swore by all that was holy that Captain Hector should be his son-in-law, or his daughter should go into a convent. And off he went to fetch the notary to draw up the settlements.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Pandolfo gone, Leander begged his beauty, who was still at the window, for the old gentleman had locked her in, to consent, in order to avoid such a catastrophe, to his carrying her off and taking her to a hermit of his acquaintance who did not in the least object to marry young people the course of whose true love was crossed by the tyrannical will of their parents. Whereto the young lady modestly returned, while avowing that she was not insensible to Leander's passion, that respect was due to one's parents, and that perhaps the hermit he spoke of was not fully qualified to marry people properly, but she did promise to resist to the best of her ability and to enter a convent rather than put her own hand in Captain Hector's big paw.

Then the lover withdrew to put matters in train, with the help of his valet, a cunning rascal, as full of tricks and stratagems as the late Ulysses. He was to return in the evening to report to his lady-love what success he had met with.

Isabella closed her window, and Captain Hector made his entry with characteristic timeliness. His appearance, which was expected, was very effective, for the most morose were moved to laughter by this personage.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Although there was no earthly reason for his indulging in such frantic gestures, the Swashbuckler, stretching his long legs like a pair of dividers and striding along with six-foot paces, marched down to the footlights and planted himself there in a swaggering, insolent, and provocative attitude as though he challenged the whole company to mortal combat. He twisted his mustache, rolled his big eyes, breathed hard through his nose, and swelled out his chest just as if he were choking with wrath at an insult that could be atoned for only by the annihilation of all mankind.

He had drawn from the bottom of his trunk for this great occasion, a costume, almost new, which he wore on great days only, and the comical quaintness and grotesquely Spanish eccentricity of which were brought out by his skinny figure. It consisted of a doublet that flared out like a corselet, and that was striped diagonally red and yellow, the stripes converging in a row of buttons arranged like overset chevrons. The point of the doublet reached low down the stomach; round the edges and upon the shoulders were round pads of the same colours; stripes, like those on the doublet, wound round the sleeves and trunk-hose, making his legs and thighs look for all the world like an onion roll. If a cock were dressed up in red stockings it would give a very good idea of the Swashbuckler's legs. Huge yellow rosettes spread out on his red slashed shoes like big cabbages; garters, with hanging ends, were fastened above the knee round his legs as straight as a heron's. A ruff mounted on cardboard, the starched folds of which formed a series of figures of eight, held his neck rigid and compelled him to hold his chin well up, a posture well suited to the impertinence of his part. His head-dress consisted of a sort of beaver of the Henry IV pattern, with one side of the brim turned up and adorned with a crest of red and white feathers. A cloak, the edges of which were cut like the wattles of a crayfish, and which reproduced the colours of the rest of the costume, flew out behind him, cocked up in burlesque fashion by the end of his immense rapier, the heavy shell-guard of which caused the point to stick up. From the end of this long thrusting sword, on which ten Moors might have been skewered, hung an ornament delicately worked in exceedingly fine brass wire, representing a cobweb, and testifying irrefutably to the very infrequent use Captain Hector made of his redoubtable weapon. Such of the spectators as were gifted with stronger sight were able to make out the little metal insect hanging at the end of its thread in the most assured peace, as though certain of not being disturbed.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Captain Hector, followed by his valet, Scappino, the health of whose eyes was constantly threatened by the end of the rapier, strode two or three times up and down the stage, stamping his heels, pulling his beaver down over his eyes and indulging in endless absurd pantomime that made the spectators roar with laughter. At last he stopped, and attitudinising in front of the footlights, began a speech full of brag, exaggeration, and rodomontade, somewhat as follows, and in which a scholar would have found evidence that the author of the play had read Plautus' "Miles gloriosus," the ancestor of the whole line of braggart swashbucklers.

"To-day, Scappino, I consent to let my slayer rest in its sheath for a short time, and to leave to physicians the task of filling the graveyards, of which I am the great purveyor. When a man has dethroned the Sophi of Persia, dragged Armorabaraquin from his camp by the beard, and with the other hand slain ten thousand infidel Turks, kicked down the ramparts of a hundred fortresses, defied Fate, flayed Chance alive, burned

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Misfortune, plucked like a gosling Jove's eagle on his refusing to meet me on the field when I summoned him, for he dreads me more than the Titans, struck fire with thunderbolts, torn heaven open with the curled up end of his mustache, he may surely permit himself to indulge in a little recreation and sportiveness. Besides, the submissive universe no longer resists my courage, and Atropos has sent me word that her shears having become blunted by dint of cutting the thread of the lives garnered in by my bilbo, she has been compelled to send them to the knife-grinder's. Therefore, Scappino, I must e'en restrain my valour, and grant a truce to duels, wars, devastations, sacking of towns, hand-to-hand fights with giants, and slaughters of monsters after the manner of Theseus and Hercules, the ordinary occupations of the ferocity of my undaunted bravery. I am resting; Death may take breath! But how does Sir Mars, a mere nobody in comparison of me, spend his holidays and vacations? In the plump white arms of Lady Venus, who, like a wise goddess, prefers warriors to all other men, and feels the utmost contempt for her lame cuckold husband. That is why I have been kind enough to condescend to become more tractable, and perceiving that

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Cupid dared not venture to let fly one of his gold-tipped shafts at a dare-devil like me, I encouraged him with a nod. Further, in order that his arrow might strike at my bold lion heart, I put off the coat of mail made out of the rings given me by my illustrious paramours, the goddesses, empresses, queens, infantas, princesses, and great ladies of every land, and the magical temper of which protects me in my maddest temerity."

"That means," said the valet, who had listened to this fiery tirade with an air of extreme disturbance of mind, "so far as my poor intellect can follow eloquence so admirable for its rhetoric, and so adorned with suitable expressions and with Oriental metaphors, that your most valiant lordship's fancy has been caught by some young bud in this town; in other words, that you are in love just like an ordinary mortal."

"Truly," replied Captain Hector, with superbly nonchalant good temper, "you have hit the nail on the head, and for a valet you are not too much of a fool. Yes, I have yielded to the infirmity of love, but fear not that it will diminish my courage; that is all very well for Samson, who allowed himself to be shorn, and for Hercules who span. Delilah would never have dared to touch my hair, and I should have used

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Omphale as a bootjack : at the least sign of refusal, I should have made her clean the skin of the Nemean lion on a table like a Spanish cape. In the course of my leisure time the thought, a humiliating one to a brave heart, occurred to me that while it is true that I have conquered the human race, I have overcome but one-half of it. Women, thanks to their feebleness, escape me. It would not be seemly to hack off their heads, to lop off their legs and arms, to cut them down to the waist, as is my custom with my masculine foes ; such martial brutality is repugnant to a well-bred man. The conquest of their hearts, the surrender at discretion of their souls, the spoiling of their virtue, satisfy me. Yet, while it is true that those who have yielded to me are more in number than the sands of the sea and the stars in heaven, that I drag round with me four coffers filled with love-letters, amorous epistles and messages, that I sleep upon a mattress stuffed with nut-brown, black, golden, and auburn locks which the most modest of women have bestowed upon me ; that Juno herself made advances to me that I would none of because her immortality was somewhat over ripe for me, even though she renews her virginity every year in the Canathian spring, — yet, I say, I count all these victories defeats, for I will not have a laurel wreath in which a single leaf is wanting; it would dishonour my brow. The lovely Isabella dares to resist me, and although audacity is always welcomed by me, I cannot bear with this impertinence on her part. I mean, therefore, that she shall herself, dishevelled and praying for pardon and mercy, on her bended knees, bring me the golden keys of her heart upon a silver salver. Go and summon that strong place to surrender. I grant three minutes for reflection; during that interval the hour-glass shall tremble in the hands of terrified Time."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Whereupon Captain Hector assumed an extravagantly angular attitude, that was made all the more ridiculous by his uncommon emaciation.

But the window did not open in response to the sarcastic summons of the valet. Confiding in the strength of the walls, and not afraid of a breach being made, the garrison, composed of Isabella and Zerlina, gave no sign of life. The Swashbuckler, whom nothing could surprise, was nevertheless amazed at this silence.

"Blood and wounds! Heavens and earth! Thunderbolts and gunshots!" roared he, his mustache bristling like the whiskers of an angry cat. "The hussies keep as still as dead goats. Let them hoist the flag and sound a parley, or with a snap of my fingers I bring the house down about their ears ! It will serve that cruel girl right if she is crushed under its ruins. Scapino, my friend, how do you account for so Hyrcanian and savage a defence against my charms, which, as every one knows, are unrivalled on this terraqueous globe as well as in Olympus, the dwelling of the gods ? ”

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

“ I account for it quite readily. There is a certain Leander, not so handsome as you, no doubt, but then every one is not endowed with good taste, who has managed to make friends with the garrison. You are attacking a fortress that has already surrendered to another victor ; you have won over the father, and Leander has won the daughter ; that is the whole thing in a nutshell.”

“ Leander, did you say ? Do not repeat his execrable and execrated name, lest in mad fury I bring down the sun, put out the moon, and catching hold of this world of ours by the end of the axle, shake it in such fashion as to bring about another diluvial cataclysm like that which Noah and Ogyges witnessed. To pay court to Isabella, the lady of my dreams, and that to my very face ! The damnable coxcomb ! The gallows bird! The unmitigated rascal! Where is he, that I may slash his face for him, spit him on my rapier, run him through, pink him in every part of his body, tear him to pieces, disembowel him, trample upon him, cast him on a burning pile, and scatter his ashes to the four winds of heaven! If he only dared to show his face while I am in this paroxysm of fury, the mere thunder of my nostrils would suffice to propel him beyond the spheres into the region of elemental fires; I should hurl him to such a height that he could never again fall upon this earth! Poaching on my own preserves! I shudder at the thought of the calamities and disasters such audacity must entail for the unhappy race of men, for I could not punish so black a crime as it deserves without shattering the planet at a stroke! Leander the rival of Captain Hector! By Mahomet and Tervagant! Speech draws back terrified and refuses to express such enormity. Words will not come together; they howl and shriek when caught hold of by the collar to put them in line, for they know they would have to answer to me for indulging in such license. From this time forth and for evermore, Leander—forgive me, O my tongue, for causing thee to utter that infamous name!—may consider himself a dead man, and the best thing he can do is to go and order his tombstone, provided I am magnanimous enough to allow him Christian burial !”

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

“By the blood of Diana !” said the valet, “you have the devil’s own luck, for here comes Master Leander stepping daintily across the square. How gloriously you will now take him to task, and what a splendid sight will be the meeting of two such brave men, for I will not conceal from you that the young gentleman is considered by the fencing masters in this town to be a pretty good hand with the rapier. Draw, and for my part I shall stand guard while you are fighting, so that you may not be disturbed by the watch.”

“The flashing of our swords will suffice to drive it away ; the fools would not venture to penetrate into the circle of flames and blood. Keep close to me, good Scappino, so that if by chance I should be grievously wounded by a sore thrust, you may be at hand to catch me in your arms,” answered the Swashbuckler, who greatly enjoyed being interrupted in a duel.

“Plant yourself bravely before him,” returned the valet, pushing his master forward, “and bar his way.”

Perceiving that there was no other way out of it, the Swashbuckler pulled his beaver well down on his eyes, curled up his mustache, put his hand on the hilt of his mighty rapier, and approached Leander, whom he looked at from head to foot in his most insolent manner ; but it was plainly all brag on his part, for his teeth chattered audibly and his spindle shanks were swaying and quivering like reeds in the blast. His last remaining hope was that he might intimidate Leander by vocal outbursts, threats, and rodomontades, for hares are not infrequently concealed under lions' skins.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“Sir, are you aware that I am Captain Hector, of the famous house of Cuerno de Cornazan, and allied to the no less illustrious family of Escobombardon de la Papirontonda? And that I am descended from Antæus on the female side?”

“You may descend from the moon if you like,” answered the Leander, with a disdainful shrug of the shoulders. “I care not a stiver for all your foolery.”

“Thunder and lightning! you will have to care for it anon; so while it is still time, get out of this, and I spare your life. I have pity on your youth. Consider me well; I am the Terror of the Universe, the Friend of Death, the Providence of grave-diggers. Wherever I pass spring up mortuary crosses. Scarcely does my shadow venture to follow me, so perilous are the places wherein I lead it. When I enter a place, it is through the breach; when I go out, it is through an arch of triumph; if I advance, it is in order to lunge; if I draw back, it is to take ground; when I lay down, it is my adversary, upon his death-bed; the streams I cross are streams of blood, and the bridges that span them are built of the bones of my foes. I plunge with delight into the mêlée, killing, hacking, slaughtering, cutting and thrusting, lunging and piercing. I toss horses and horsemen into the air, and break the bones of elephants as if they were but straw. In storming cities, I escalate the walls with the help of a couple of stilettoes, and plunge my arm into the barrels of the cannons from which I extract the balls. The mere wind of my sword overthrows battalions like sheaves of wheat upon the threshing-floor. When Mars meets me on the battlefield, he flees, lest I should strike him down, great god of war though he is; in a word, so wondrous is my valour and so tremendous the terror I inspire that until now, I, the Apothecary of Death, have never seen anything but the backs of the bravest men."

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

"Well, you shall now see the face of one of them," returned Leander, as he smote the Swashbuckler so mighty a box on the ear that the burlesque echo of it resounded throughout the hall. The poor devil was fairly swung round by the force of the blow, and was nearly falling when a second box, this time on the other ear, made him recover his equilibrium.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

While this scene was going on, Isabella and Zerbina had reappeared on the balcony; the roguish maid was holding her sides with laughter, and her mistress nodded in friendly fashion to Leander. From the end of the square came Pandolfo, accompanied by the notary, who with eyes like saucers and hands outspread in surprise, watched Leander thrashing Captain Hector.

“By the scales of the crocodile and the horns of the rhinoceros!” howled the boaster, “your grave is yawning wide, you rascal, you ruffian, you caitiff; and I shall hurl you into it. Better would it have been for you to pull the whiskers of tigers and the tails of snakes in the Indian jungle! To dare to tease Hector! Why, Pluto himself, armed with his pitchfork, would not be so venturesome. If he were, I should cast him down from the throne of Hell and usurp Proserpina. Come, man-slaying sword of mine, flash out, and bury thy thunderbolt self in the bowels of this hothead. I thirst for his blood, I hunger for his marrow, for his heart and his liver, and I shall drag his soul out from between his teeth.”

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

While thus shouting, the Swashbuckler, with swelling muscles, rolling eyes, and clickings of the tongue, seemed to be making prodigious efforts to draw his unwilling sword from its sheath. He panted with the exertion, but the prudent thunderbolt man-slayer proposed to stay where it was on this occasion, no doubt in order to avoid dimming its polished steel by contact with the damp air.

Tired of watching the Swashbuckler's grotesque contortions, the lover bestowed upon the braggart a kick so hearty that it sent his rival flying to the other end of the stage, and then, with an exquisitely graceful bow to Isabella, he withdrew.

Captain Hector, having fallen upon his back, was kicking his thin legs about like a grasshopper that has been upset. When, with the assistance of Pandolfo and his valet, he had at last been set upon his feet, and had made certain that Leander was really gone, he burst out, panting and breathing hard as if suffocated by anger : —

“I pray thee, Scappino, bind me round with iron bands; I am bursting with fury, I shall explode like a bombshell! And as for thee, perfidious blade, that playest thy master false in the deadliest crisis, is this how thou rewardest me for imbuing thee constantly with the blood of the haughtiest warriors and the most valiant duellists? I know not why I do not break thee in a thousand pieces across my knee, for thy cowardice, thy falseness, and thy felony! But no doubt thou desiredst to make me understand that a true soldier's place is on the breach, and that he must not dally within the Capua of love. And it is too true that this whole week I have defeated no army, slain no monster, fought no dragon, that I have failed to provide Death with its supply of bodies, and therefore it is my sword has rusted; rusted with shame, stuck through lack of service! That coxcomb has insulted me under the very eyes of my love; insulted me, jeered at me, challenged me! It is a lesson, a profound one; the very teaching of philosophy; a moral apologue. Henceforth I slay two or three men before breakfast, to make sure that my rapier shall draw easily. Be sure to remind me of it."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

"Leander might return," said Scappino. "Suppose we were to try together to draw your redoubtable weapon from its sheath."

Forthwith the Swashbuckler braced himself against a stone, and Scappino took hold of the shell hilt, Pandolfo hanging on to the valet, and the notary to Pandolfo. After a few attempts the blade yielded to the efforts of the three oddities, who promptly rolled over on their backs, while Captain Hector tumbled over with his long legs in the air, still grasping with both hands the sheath of the rapier.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Picking himself up at once, he seized the weapon and said grandiloquently : —

“Now Leander has ceased to live. His only chance of escaping death is to emigrate to some distant planet, for even were he to burrow into the very centre of the earth, I should bring him back to the surface and transfix him with my sword, unless my terrifying Medusa-like aspect had previously changed him to stone.”

Notwithstanding the little unpleasantness, obstinate old Pandolfo abated not a jot of his belief in the heroism of Captain Hector, and persisted in his absurd idea of giving his daughter Isabella in marriage to this splendid fellow. Isabella melted into tears, and said she preferred a convent to such a husband, while Zerbina stood up for the handsome Leander to the best of her ability and swore by her spotless reputation — a fine thing to swear by, truly ! — that the marriage should never take place. The Swashbuckler attributed the coldness of his reception to excess of modesty, for well brought up girls avoid showing their love. Besides, he had not yet begun to pay his court to the lady ; he had not exhibited himself in all his glory, imitating in this respect the discreet conduct of Jupiter towards Semele, who, because she desired to behold her divine lover in all the splendour of his power, was blasted by fire and reduced to a tiny heap of ashes.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The two women returned to their lodging without listening further to him. Captain Hector, desiring to play the gallant, had Scappino fetch him a guitar, and resting one foot upon the post, began to tickle the instrument to make it laugh. Then he began to miaoul a stanza of a seguidilla, in Andalusian, with such extraordinary swelling of the voice, such strange single breaths, and such impossible falsetto notes, that it sounded like the serenade of Rominagrobis under the White Cat's gutter.

Zerbina poured a pailful of water upon him, under pretext that she was watering the flowers, but it failed to quench his musical ardour.

"Tears of tenderness falling from the lovely eyes of Isabella," remarked Captain Hector. "In me the hero has an artist for his double, and I handle the lyre as well as I do the sword."

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Unfortunately, Leander, worried by the strains of the serenade, which he heard as he wandered in the neighbourhood, turned up again, resolved that the rascal should not perform under the balcony of his lady-love, and snatched the guitar from the hands of the Swashbuckler, who was pale with fright. Then he dealt him such a crack over the poll with it that the body of the instrument was broken open, and the braggart's head passing through, he was caught by the neck as in a Chinese cangue. Leander, without letting go the handle of the guitar, pulled the unhappy Hector hither and thither, jerking him round, shoving him against the side-scenes, and pushing him over the footlights till he nearly caught fire, all of which by-play was as amusing as it was ridiculous. What the unfortunate Swashbuckler, who appeared to be wearing a frying-pan on his head, looked like, may be easily imagined.

But this was not the end of his troubles. Leander's valet, with his well-known fertility of invention, had prepared a stratagem to prevent the marriage of Isabella and the Captain. Set on by him, a certain Doralise, exceedingly coquettish and given to flirtation, turned up, accompanied by a brave brother, the part being taken by the Tyrant, who had put on his most ferocious expression and who carried under his arm a couple of long rapiers that formed a Saint Andrew's cross of terrifying aspect. The young lady complained of having been wronged by Captain Hector, whom she charged with having deserted her in favour of Isabella, Pandolfo's daughter, an outrage that could be atoned for only by the shedding of blood.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

"Polish off quickly that cut-throat," said Pandolfo to his future son-in-law. "It will be mere play for your incomparable valour, that even a whole camp of Saracens could not daunt."

Much against his will, Captain Hector fell on guard after innumerable comical grimaces, but he trembled like an aspen, and the bravo, Doralise's brother, sent his weapon flying the very first time their blades crossed, and then smote him with the flat of his sword until the poor fellow begged for mercy.

By way of topping the ridiculous business, dame Leonardo, dressed as a Spanish duenna, came on, wiping her owl-like eyes with a huge handkerchief, uttering sighs unutterable, and waving in front of Captain Hector's face a promise of marriage sealed with the forged seal of the Swashbuckler. Another storm of blows broke upon the wretch convicted of so many perfidies, and he was unanimously condemned to espouse the Leonardo woman as a punishment for his bragging, his rodomontades, and his cowardice. Pandolfo, disgusted with him, no longer objected to giving his daughter's hand to Leander, an accomplished gentleman.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

This buffoonery, enlivened as it was by the performance of the actors, was received with loud applause. The men thought the maid fetching; the women allowed that Isabella was decorously charming, but Captain Hector it was who won the loudest and most unanimous plaudits, for it would have been hard to find any one who united more completely the requirements of the part in himself: uncommon leanness, pomposity of speech, and grotesqueness and unexpectedness of gesture. Leander was admired by the beauties, though the men thought him a fop. This was the impression he generally made, and, indeed, he cared not to produce any other, for he was vainer of his person than of his art. Nor did Serafina's beauty fail to find admirers, and more than one young gentleman, at the risk of incurring the displeasure of his lovely neighbour, swore to himself that she was adorable.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Sigognac, concealed in the wings, had derived the greatest delight from Isabella's performance, although he had felt occasional twinges of jealousy on hearing the tender tones in which she replied to Leander, for he was not yet used to stage love-making, which often conceals deep aversion and downright enmity. So, when the play came to an end, he complimented the young actress in a constrained fashion that she at once noted, and the cause of which she guessed without difficulty.

"You play the part of a girl in love in the most admirable way ; so well, indeed, that you might easily be thought to be in earnest."

"That is precisely my business," answered the young lady, with a smile, "and it is for that very purpose that the manager engaged me."

"No doubt," returned Sigognac ; "but you seemed really in love with that coxcomb, who can only show his teeth like a dog that is being teased, turn out his toes, and parade his shapely leg."

"My part compelled me to look as though I were in love with him. Would you have had me stand there like a stick, pulling a sour and disagreeable face ? And, for the matter of that, did I not maintain the character of a well-bred girl? If I failed in this respect, I beg you will tell me, and I shall make amends."

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

"Oh! no; you did look like a modest girl, brought up carefully in the school of good manners, and there is no fault to be found with your artistic performance, so true and so modest that it literally held the mirror up to nature."

"My dear Baron, the lights are going out, the company has withdrawn, and we shall be finding ourselves in the dark. Pray throw this cape over my shoulders and take me to my room."

Sigognac performed, not too awkwardly, though his hands trembled, the duties, new to him, of escort to an actress, and they issued together from the hall, in which there was now no one left.

The orangery was situated a short distance from the mansion, and somewhat to the left of it, in a thick grove of trees. The façade of the castle upon this side was not less splendid than upon the other. As the level of the park was lower on this side than on that of the flower garden, the building stretched along a terrace with a balustrade formed of paunchy pilasters, and broken at intervals by pedestals that upbore vases of blue and white china containing shrubs and flowers, the last of the season. A double flight of steps, projecting beyond the supporting wall of the terrace, led down to the park, the wall itself being formed of great brick panels framed in stone-work. The general appearance was quite majestic.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

It was about nine o'clock at night; the moon had risen, and a light mist, like a silvery gauze, softened the outlines of objects, though it did not prevent their being distinguished. The façade of the castle was clearly seen; some of the windows glowed red, while others, on which the beams of the orb of night fell, sparkled suddenly with a flashing like that of fish-scales. In that light the rosy tones of the brick-work turned to a most delicate lilac shade, and the stone courses became pearly gray. White reflections played upon the slates of the roofs as upon polished steel, and the dentellated crest stood out black against a sky of milky transparency. Drops of light fell upon the leaves of the shrubbery, splashed upon the enamelled vases, and diapered with brilliants the sward that stretched out beyond the terrace. When the gaze roamed farther afield, it beheld a no less enchanting sight, the drives and walks in the park vanishing in the distance, as in Paradise Breughel's landscapes, in azure dimness and mistiness, with here and there the silvery gleam of a statue or of a pond.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Isabella and Sigognac ascended the steps, and, charmed with the beauty of the night, took a few turns up and down the terrace before going to their rooms. As the place was quite open and in full view of the house, the young actress' modesty was in no wise alarmed by this evening stroll. Besides, the Baron's shyness reassured her, for although her parts were those of innocent young girls, she knew enough of love to be aware that the characteristic of true passion is respectfulness. Sigognac had not formally declared himself, but she felt he loved her, and consequently feared no insult to her virtue.

With the sweet shyness of nascent love, the young couple, as they walked side by side, arm in arm, in the solitary park, talked of the most insignificant trifles only. Had any one been spying upon them, he would have overheard, to his surprise, merely commonplaces, meaningless reflections, and very ordinary questions and answers. But while the words themselves gave no inkling of passion, the trembling voices, the accents of emotion, the long pauses, the sighs, and the low, confidential tone of the conversation betrayed the inmost thoughts of the pair.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Yolande's room, being near that of the Marchioness herself, looked out upon the park, and when the young lady, after her women had made her ready for bed, happened to gaze out at the moon that shone above the great trees, she caught sight of Sigognac and Isabella strolling on the terrace, unattended save by their own shadows. Assuredly, haughty Yolande, proud like the goddess she was, felt naught but contempt for poor Baron de Sigognac, past whom she had at times flashed like a dazzling vision in a whirlwind of light and sound when she was out hunting, and whom, indeed, she had recently almost insulted. Nevertheless she was annoyed to see him under her window, in company with a young woman to whom he was certainly making love, for she did not admit that a man could thus throw off his allegiance to her; all were bound to die in silence for her. So she went to bed in a pretty bad temper, and found it somewhat difficult to woo sleep to her eyes, for the amorous couple preoccupied her greatly.

Sigognac escorted Isabella to her room, and just as he was about to enter his own, he observed at the end of the passage a mysterious individual wrapped in a dun-coloured cloak, the end of which, thrown over his shoulder, concealed his face up to the eyes, while a beaver pulled well down hid the upper part and protected him as effectually as a mask. When he saw Isabella and the Baron, he drew as close to the wall as he could. It could be no one of the actors, for all had retired to their rooms ; besides, the Tyrant was taller, the Pedant stouter, and Leander slimmer ; the man did not look like either Scappino or the Swashbuckler, the latter of whom was so easily recognisable by his uncommon leanness, that not even the ample folds of a mantle could disguise.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

Not wishing to appear inquisitive and to interfere with the unknown, Sigognac hastened to enter his own room, noticing, however, that the door of the Tapestry Chamber, occupied by Zerbina, was discreetly ajar, as if she were awaiting a visitor who desired not to be heard entering. Once within his room, Sigognac was made aware by a faint creaking of shoes and the soft, careful shooting of a bolt, that the cloaked prowler had safely reached the haven where he would be.

An hour later, Leander opened his door very gently ; looked round to see whether the hall was clear, and treading as lightly as a gipsy girl performing the egg-dance, made for the stairs, which he descended more softly and more noiselessly than ghosts that wander in haunted castles. Once outside, he followed the wall, keeping carefully in the shadow, and proceeded towards a grove or arbour, in the centre of which stood a statue of Discreet Love, represented with its finger on its lips. At this place, no doubt indicated to him beforehand, Leander stopped and seemed to be expecting some one.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

I have already mentioned that, interpreting to his advantage the smile the Marchioness had bestowed upon him in recognition of his bow, he had boldly ventured to write her a letter, which Jane, bribed with a few pistoles, had engaged to place secretly on her mistress' dressing-table.

The letter read as follows, and I give the copy of it in order to afford an idea of the style employed by Leander to seduce great ladies, an art in which he claimed to excel.

“Madam, or rather Goddess of Beauty, blame your own incomparable charms alone for the mishap that is befalling you. They it is that compel me by their brilliancy to emerge from the shadows in which I ought to remain buried, and to draw near unto your radiance, even as dolphins rise from the depths of Ocean attracted by the gleams of the fishermen's lanterns, though these are the signal of their doom, and knowing that they will pitilessly perish under the blows of the sharp harpoons. I know too well that the wave will be imbrued with my gore, yet, as I cannot live, I care not if I die. It is, I trow, most strange audacity in me to indulge in the hope, reserved for the gods alone, that I may receive my death-stroke from your own hand. Nevertheless I venture to ask it, for being reduced to desperation beforehand, nothing worse can befall me, and I prefer your anger to your contempt or your disdain. When one strikes a mortal blow, one must look upon the victim, and while expiring under your cruelties, I shall taste the supreme joy of having been seen by you. Yes, Madam, I love you, and if it be a crime, I none the less do not repent of it. God allows Himself to be adored; the stars tolerate the admiration of the meanest herd, and it is the fate of such exalted perfection as yours that it can be loved only by its inferiors, since it has no equal upon earth, and scarcely in heaven itself. I am, alas! but a poor strolling player, but even were I a Duke, a Prince, laden with all the favours of Fortune, my head would not reach to your feet, and there would still be between your splen-dour and my nothingness the vast space that separates the highest of summits from the lowest of depths. You will always have to stoop to accept the offering of a heart, but mine, I dare say it, Madam, is as proud as it is tender, and she who did not repel it would find it filled with the most ardent love, the most perfect scrupulousness, the most absolute respect, and the most unbounded devotion. Besides, did such happiness come to me, your indulgence would perhaps not have to stoop as low as you may fancy, for, although compelled by adverse Fate and the jealous rancour of one of the great of the earth to conceal myself on the stage under the disguise of the part I play, my birth is not such that I need blush for it, and if I dared violate the secrecy imposed upon me by reasons of State, it would be seen that fairly illustrious blood flows in my veins. The woman who may love me will not love beneath her rank. But I have said more than I ought, and I shall ever be no more than the most humble and the least of your servants, even if, through one of those recognitions which serve to bring tragedies to a close, every one should salute in me a Prince's son. Let but one sign, the faintest, give me to understand that my boldness has not moved you to too disdainful anger, and I shall expire without regret, in the fire of your glance, upon my funeral pyre."

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

In order to tell what the Marchioness might have replied to this burning epistle, which had perchance done service before, one would need to know the feminine heart very thoroughly. Unfortunately, the letter never reached its destination. Leander, in his craze for great ladies, never bestowed a single glance upon their maids and never flirted with them; wherein he was wrong, for maids have much influence upon their mistresses. Had the pistoles wherewith he had bribed Jane been accompanied by a few kisses and a few liberties, Jane, whose lady's-maid self-love would have been satisfied, and deserved to be so as much as a queen's, would have been more zealous and faithful in the discharge of her mission.

As she happened to be holding Leander's letter carelessly in her hand, she was met by the Marquis, who, not being naturally an inquisitive husband, asked her, merely as a matter of form, what the paper was she was carrying.

"Nothing much," she answered; "a letter from Mr. Leander to her ladyship."

"From Leander, the leading man in the company?"

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The one who plays the lover's part in 'The Rodomontades of Captain Hector'? What can he have to write to my wife about? No doubt he is asking for a gratuity."

"I do not think so," answered the dissatisfied maid, "for when he handed me the note he kept on sighing and turning up his eyes like a love-sick swain."

"Give me the letter," said the Marquis. "I shall be answerable for it. And say nothing to the Marchioness about it; these strollers are occasionally impertinent, and spoiled by our indulgence, forget to keep their place."

And the Marquis, who dearly loved a joke, caused a reply to be written to Leander, couched in the same flowery style, in a big lordly hand, on musk-scented paper, and sealed with perfumed Spanish wax and a fancy seal, in order the better to excite the poor fool's amorous imagination.

When Leander returned to his room after the performance, he found on his table, in the most conspicuous place, a note left by some unknown hand, and bearing the superscription, "For Mr. Leander."

He opened it trembling with delight and read as follows : —

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

“As you have said but too truly for my peace of mind, goddesses may love mortals alone. At eleven o’clock, when all on earth are sleeping, Diana, not having to fear mortals’ indiscreet glances, will descend to meet Endymion, not on Mount Latmos, but in the park, at the foot of the statue of Discreet Love, where the handsome shepherd must be sure to be sleeping in order to spare the blushes of the goddess, who will come unattended by her train of nymphs, shrouded in a cloud, and having put aside her silvery beams.”

It may readily be imagined what mad joy filled Leander’s heart on reading this note, the contents of which went far beyond his wildest conceit. He poured a whole bottle of scent upon his hair and his hands, chewed a piece of mace to improve his breath, brushed his teeth anew, twisted the end of his ringlets to make them curl more, and proceeded to the park, to the spot indicated, where, while I have been telling you all this, I have left him waiting all forlorn.

The excitement of waiting and the coolness of the night made him shiver nervously; he started at the least fall of a leaf, and listened for the faintest noise with an ear practised to catch the whisper of the prompter; the sand creaking under his feet seemed to make a dreadful uproar that must certainly be audible in the mansion. In spite of himself the sacred terror of the great woods was overpowering him, and the mighty, sombre trees acted upon his imagination. He was not exactly afraid, but his thoughts were becoming somewhat lugubrious. The Marchioness was late in coming, and Diana was making Endymion wait rather long in the night-dew. Once he thought he heard a dry branch crack under the tread of some one, but it was too heavy to be the step of his divinity; deities glide on beams of sun or moon, and alight without causing even a blade of grass to bend.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“If her ladyship does not make haste,” thought Leander, “instead of a gallant full of ardour she will find only a very chilly lover. Such tiring long waits are not conducive to earnest love-making.”

He had got no farther in his reflections when four stout shadows, emerging from behind the trees and the pedestal of the statue, came simultaneously upon him. Two of these shadows, which were the bodies of tall fellows, lackeys in the service of the Marquis, seized the player's arms and held them like those of captives that are to be bound, while the two others set about thrashing him in regular rhythm. The blows rattled on his back like sledge-hammers on an anvil, but as the poor wretch desired above all to avoid attracting people to the spot by making an outcry and thus rendering his misfortune public, he bore the pain heroically. Mucius Scævola stood having his hand burned off in the brasier no more stolidly than Leander stood the blows of the sticks.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

The full tale of strokes having been administered, the four torturers let their victim go, bowed low to him, and withdrew without having uttered a word.

But oh ! the shameful fall ! Icarus himself, precipitated from high heaven, came not down in more piteous fashion. Bruised, mauled, sore, and black and blue all over, Leander limped back to the house, bent in two and rubbing his ribs ; but so vast was his conceit that it never occurred to him that he was the victim of a practical joke. His self-love found it more expedient to give a tragical turn to the adventure. He said to himself that, no doubt, the Marchioness, having been watched by her jealous husband, had been followed and seized upon ere she could reach the meeting-place, and had been compelled by threats against her life to confess everything. He could see her on her knees, her beautiful hair loose, asking mercy of the wrathful Marquis, shedding tears in abundance, and promising to be henceforth more on her guard against a possible surprising of her love. Even while stiff and sore from the blows he had received, he pitied her for having run such peril for his sake, wholly unsuspecting that she knew not a word of the business and was even then resting very peacefully between her Holland linen sheets, that had been carefully warmed with a warming-pan filled with sandal-wood and cinnamon.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

As he made his way along the passage, Leander was annoyed by the sight of Scappino's head stuck out of his half-opened door; he noted that the wretch was sniggering. He drew himself up as well as he could, but the cunning beggar was not to be fooled.

The next morning the company prepared to depart. The ox-cart was given up as being too slow a mode of conveyance, and the Tyrant, handsomely paid by the Marquis, hired a big four-horse waggon to transport the actors and their luggage. Leander rose late, as did Zerbina; but while the former tried to look unconcerned, in spite of his pitiful look of suffering, the other was radiant with satisfied ambition. She even went the length of patronising her companions, and, a serious symptom, the duenna paid her court with a wheedling obsequiousness she had never before exhibited towards her. Scappino, whom nothing ever escaped, remarked that in some mysterious way Zerbina's trunk was twice as heavy as before. Serafina bit her lips and hissed out between her teeth, "The jade!" but the soubrette pretended not to hear her, being temporarily satisfied with the humiliation of the leading lady.

AT BRUYÈRES CASTLE

At last the waggon started and they left the hospitable castle of Bruyères, which all save Leander regretted. The Tyrant was thinking of the pistoles he had received; the Pedant, of the excellent wines he had drunk in such quantities; the Swashbuckler, of the applause lavished upon him; Zerbina, of her taffetas, gold necklaces, and other spoils; Sigognac and Isabella thought of their love only, and, satisfied since they were together, did not even turn round to see for the last time in the distance the blue roofs and golden walls of the mansion.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

VI

A SNOW EFFECT

THE players, as will be readily understood, were well pleased with the stay they had made at Bruyères, for such luck was not frequent in their wandering life. The Tyrant had portioned out the money, and each one fingered with a pleasant sensation a number of pistoles in pockets that usually were bare as Mother Hubbard's cupboard. Zerbina, radiant with mysterious and restrained delight, took in good part her comrades' jokes about the power of her charms. She was triumphant, and it made Serafina madder than ever. Leander alone, still sore from the nocturnal thrashing he had received, failed to share the general joy, and his smile was affected and forced. His gestures were constrained, and every jolt of the waggon drew from him a significant grimace. Whenever he thought himself unobserved, he would rub his shoulders and arms, a concealed manœuvre that escaped the attention of the other players, but could not deceive the sly curiosity of Scappino, ever on the watch for mishaps that might befall Leander, whose conceit was particularly obnoxious to him.

A SNOW EFFECT

The wheel of the waggon bumping against a large stone which the driver had failed to notice drew from the gallant an exclamation of pain, and straightway Scappino entered into conversation with him on pretence of sympathising with him.

“My poor Leander, what is the matter with you that you go on groaning and moaning in that way? You seem to be as sore as the Knight of the Sad Countenance after he had cut so many capers, without any clothes on, in the Sierra Morena, by way of performing a lover’s penance after the fashion of Amadis on Poverty Rock. So sunken are your eyes, and wan and sickly your face one would think your bed had been made of crossed bludgeons, instead of a soft mattress, with a counterpane, pillows, and bolster, which, after all, are better suited to rest sore limbs. I should judge that Morpheus did not visit you last night.”

“Morpheus may have remained in his grot, but the little god Cupid is a prowler who needs no lantern to find his way to a door in a passage,” replied Leander, endeavouring to throw his enemy off the scent.

“I am only a comedy valet and know nothing of love affairs. I have never paid court to fine ladies, but I do know enough to be aware that the little god Cupid, if poets and writers of romances are to be believed, uses his arrows, and not the wood of his bow to smite those he desires to wound."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

"What do you mean?" broke in Leander, uneasy at the turn Scappino's mythological subtleties and deductions were giving to the conversation.

"Nothing, except that you have on your neck, a little above the collar-bone, a black mark that will be blue to-morrow, green the next day, and then yellow until the place regains its natural colour. That mark is devilishly like a genuine blow of a stick upon calf-skin, or vellum, if you prefer that."

"No doubt," said Leander, who, previously pale, had now blushed to his ears, "some fair dead beauty, who was in love with me during her life, kissed me in my dreams while I was asleep. Every one knows that the kisses of the dead make marks on the skin that amaze one on waking."

"Your defunct and ghostly beauty comes in the nick of time," retorted Scappino; "but I could have sworn that so vigorous a kiss had been bestowed by a pair of green-oak lips."

A SNOW EFFECT

“You motley fool and zany, you,” returned Leander; “you drive my modesty into a corner. I chastely credit the dead with what might with better right be claimed by the living. Unlearned and rustic though you affect to be, you have surely heard tell of pretty marks, spots, bruises, and bites, that are remembrances of the mad sport of lovers?”

“Memoram dente notam,” interrupted the Pedant, quite pleased at having an opportunity of quoting Horace.

“Your explanation strikes me as judicious,” answered Scappino, “and it is supported by sound authorities. Yet the mark is so long that your nocturnal beauty, whether dead or alive, must have possessed the single tooth the Gorgons were in the habit of passing on to each other in turn.”

Leander, mad with fury, tried to get at Scappino to thrash him, but the soreness left by the bastinado on his bruised ribs and his back striped like a zebra’s skin was so keen that he had perforce to sit down again and to postpone his vengeance until a more favourable time. The Tyrant and the Pedant, well used to the quarrels between the pair, insisted upon their becoming reconciled. Scappino promised never again to allude to such matters.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“I will exclude from my speech,” said he, “any reference to wood in any shape or form whatever, whether in the rough, in barks, in planks, or in bludgeons.”

During this absurd altercation, the waggon had been going on, and soon reached four cross-roads, the meeting of them being marked by a turfed mound on which rose a rough wooden cross, cracked by the sun and rain : on it was placed a figure of Christ, one of the arms of which had parted company with the body and, held by a rusty nail only, hung down in sinister fashion.

A group of two men and three mules had pulled up there and was apparently awaiting the coming of some one. One of the mules, as though impatient at having to stand, shook its head covered with pompons and tufts of all colours, with a silvery tinkling of bells. Although embroidered leather blinkers prevented its seeing to the right or to the left, it had smelled the approach of the waggon ; the working of its long ears denoted its restless curiosity, and its upturned lips showed its grinning teeth.

“The bell-mule is wagging her ears and grinning,” said one of the men. “The waggon cannot be far off now.”

And as he spoke the waggon reached the cross-roads.

A SNOW EFFECT

Zerbina, seated in front, cast a quick glance at the men and animals and seemed in no wise surprised at their presence in that spot.

“By the gods! that is a stylish equipage,” cried the Tyrant. “These Spanish mules are fit to travel fifty or sixty miles a day, and if we had such steeds we should soon reach Paris. But who the devil are they waiting for? No doubt it is a relay prepared for some nobleman.”

“No,” put in the duenna. “The mule is equipped with cushions and blankets, as if for a lady’s use.”

“Then,” said the Tyrant, “it is a case of carrying off a lady, for the two equerries in gray livery look uncommonly mysterious.”

“You may be right,” said Zerbina, with a strange smile.

“Can the lady be in our party?” said Scappino. “I see one of the equerries coming this way as if he desired to parley before resorting to force.”

“There will be no need of that,” interjected Serafina, casting at the same time upon the soubrette a glance of contempt which the latter stood with quiet impudence. “There are good-natured people who drop of themselves into a ravisher’s arms.”

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“It is not every one gets the chance to be carried off,” snapped back the maid. “It is not enough to want to be ; you have to be attractive into the bargain.”

The conversation had reached this point when the equerry, signing to the driver to pull up, asked, cap in hand, whether Miss Zerbina were in the waggon.

Zerbina, quick as a flash, put her small brown face out from under the awning, replied herself to the question, and sprang to the ground.

“I am at your orders, Miss,” said the equerry in respectful tones.

The maid shook out her skirts, slipped her finger round the front of her corsage, as if to free her bosom, and turning towards the players addressed them as follows in the most deliberate fashion : —

“Forgive me, my dear comrades, if I leave you thus. Sometimes opportunity compels you to grasp it by offering its lock to you, and this so conveniently that it would be downright folly not to clutch it with both hands, for when the chance is once lost it never again returns. Fortune, which until now had frowned, is now smiling graciously upon me, and I am going to profit by its kindly disposition, especially as it may not last long. In my humble part of a soubrette, I could aspire to Mascarilles or Scappinos only. The valets alone paid court to me, while their masters made love to Lucindas, Leonoras, and Isabellas. Scarcely did these noble gentlemen deign to chuck me under the chin and to add a kiss on my cheek to the gold they slipped into the pocket of my apron. Now it has come to pass that a man of better taste has come to the conclusion that off the boards the maid is as good as the mistress, and as my part does not call for particularly rigorous virtue, I, in my turn, have come to the conclusion that I ought not to grieve the dear man who was so sorry to see me go. Therefore I will, if you please, remove my trunks from the waggon and bid you all farewell. I shall join you in Paris one of these days, for I am actress first and last, and I have never been long unfaithful to the stage."

A S N O W E F F E C T

The men laid hold of Zerbina's boxes, and loaded them upon the transport mule, taking care to even the weight on either side. The maid, assisted by the equerry, sprang on to the bell-mule as lightly as if she had studied horsemanship in a riding-school, then rapping the animal's flank with her heel, she went off making a farewell gesture to her comrades.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“Good luck to you, Zerbina,” cried all the players, save and except Serafina, who felt bitterly towards her.

“I am sorry to see her go,” said the Tyrant; “I should have liked to keep her with us, for she is an excellent soubrette; but she was bound to us by her fancy only. We shall have to change the maid’s parts in our plays and adapt them to duennas or chaperons, who are not as attractive as a saucy face; but dame Leonardo can be very funny, and, besides, is a consummate actress. We shall manage somehow.”

The waggon started at a livelier gait than the ox-cart had been wont to do. The country it was traversing contrasted with the appearance of the moors; the white sand had been replaced by red soil that afforded more nourishment to the vegetation. Houses built of stone, and testifying to a certain amount of comfort, showed here and there in the midst of gardens surrounded by quickset hedges that had already lost their leaves, but on which glowed wild haws and sloes. Along the sides of the road, well grown trees shot up, their trunks vigorous and their limbs stout; their yellow leaves covered the ground around them or were blown by the breeze about Isabella and Sigognac, who, tiring of the constrained attitude they were compelled to adopt in the waggon, rested themselves by walking along for a time. The Swashbuckler had gone on ahead, his thin figure, that seemed spitted upon his rapier, standing out dark against the flaming sunset on the top of the rise.

A SNOW EFFECT

“How comes it,” said Sigognac to Isabella, as they walked on, “that you, who, in the modesty of your behaviour, the soundness of your remarks, and the choice of your words, exhibit all the characteristics of a high-born girl, have attached yourself to this company of strolling players, who, worthy though they are, yet belong to a different station in life?”

“Do not take me,” returned Isabella, “because I happen to have some breeding, for an unfortunate princess or queen driven from her realms, and compelled to earn her living on the stage. My story is a very simple one, and since you are interested in it, I shall tell it you. Far from having been reduced to my present condition by reverses of fate, unexpected disasters, or romantic adventures, I was born in it, being, as the saying is, a child of the stage. The car of Thespis was my birth-place and my travelling fatherland. My mother, who played the parts of queens in tragedies, was a very beautiful woman. She took her parts seriously, and even off the boards would heed none but kings, princes, dukes, and such great personages, looking upon her tinsel crowns and gilded sceptres as genuine. When she used to come off the stage into the wings, she swept along so majestically in her imitation-velvet robes that they looked like a train of purple or a long drawn out royal mantle. Her pride made her refuse to listen to the avowals, prayers, and pledges of the sparks who are always fluttering round actresses like moths round a candle. One evening, indeed, in her dressing-room, when a young fop attempted to take liberties with her, she rose, drew herself up like a real Thomyris, Queen of Scythia, and called out, 'Seize him, guards!' in so regal, contemptuous, and solemn tone, that the gallant, very much abashed, fairly bolted, afraid of pressing his suit. Now this pride of hers and her fashion of repelling would-be lovers, so unusual in a profession ever accounted of easy morals, having come to the ears of a very high and mighty prince, struck him as being in very good taste, and it appeared to him that such disdain of the profane crowd could spring only from a noble mind. As his rank in the world was equivalent to that of a tragedy queen, he was received more pleasantly and with a gentler smile. He was young, handsome, of good address, passionate, and had the great advantage of being a nobleman. Need I say more? This time the queen did not summon her guards, and you see in me the fruit of that love."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

A SNOW EFFECT

"That," gallantly replied Sigognac, "explains the incomparable grace you possess; princely blood flows in your veins; I had almost guessed it."

"This connection," continued Isabella, "lasted longer than is the wont of such affairs in our profession. The Prince found my mother remained faithful to him, as much from pride as from love, it is true, but her fidelity never wavered. Unfortunately, reasons of State compelled him to go off to the wars and to proceed on embassies to distant countries. A match, which he put off as long as he could, was arranged in his name by his family with a lady of very high rank, and he finally had to yield, for he had not the right to break, for the sake of an amorous caprice, the long line of ancestors that went back to Charlemagne, and to cause his race to die with him. Large sums were offered to my mother for the purpose of softening a separation that had become inevitable, and also to preserve her from want and enable her to bring me up and educate me. But she would not accept anything, saying that she could not take the money when the heart was no longer hers, and that she would rather the Prince were indebted to her than she to him, for, with extreme generosity, she had bestowed upon him what he could never restore to her. 'Not to be bought, either before or after,' was her motto. So she continued to play her parts of tragedy queens, though with a broken heart, and languished on until her death, which occurred not long afterwards. I was then a child seven or eight years of age, and filled the parts of children, Cupids, and such others as were fitted to my age and intelligence. My mother's death caused me grief beyond that natural to my years, and I remember I had to be whipped that day to compel me to play the part of one of Medea's children. Then my great sorrow was gradually lulled by the gentle arts of the actors and actresses, who rivalled each other in petting me, never omitting to put some sweets into my little basket. The Pedant, who was a member of our company, and who seemed to me even then as aged and wrinkled as he looks now, became interested in me, taught me the harmony and rhythm of verse and the way of reciting it, how to speak and how to listen, what attitudes and gestures to adopt, how to harmonise my expression with the particular situation, in a word, all the secrets of the art of which he is a master, although he is only a strolling player; for he was once master of a school, and was dismissed on account of his being an irreclaimable drunkard. Amid the apparent disorders of a vagabond life, I have lived innocent and chaste; for to my companions, who had known me from my birth, I was a sister or a daughter, and to fops I turned a cold, reserved, discreet mien that has kept them at a distance and has enabled me to continue off the boards, as was proper, my part of an ingenuous maiden without hypocrisy or assumed modesty."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

A SNOW EFFECT

Thus, as they walked on, did Isabella relate to the delighted Sigognac the story of her life and adventures.

"Do you remember, or have you forgotten, the name of the nobleman?" asked he.

"It might be unwise to mention it," replied Isabella, "but it is engraved in my memory."

"Is there any proof of his connection with your mother?"

"I possess a seal engraved with his arms," said Isabella, "which is the only gift of his my mother would keep, its beauty and heraldic meaning surpassing its mere pecuniary worth. I shall show it to you some day, if you like."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

It would be tiresome to follow the waggon stage by stage, the more so that the company did not journey far every day and that there were no incidents worth remembering. So I shall pass over some time and bring the players to the vicinity of Poitiers. Business had not proved remunerative and dark days had fallen upon the company. The money received from the Marquis de Bruyères had been all spent, as well as Sigognac's pistoles, for his kindness of heart compelled him to aid his distressed companions to the utmost of his power. The waggon, that had started with four strong animals, was now drawn by one steed, and such a steed! a poor brute that seemed to have been fed on barrel-hoops instead of oats and hay, so prominent were its ribs. Its bones showed through the skin, the relaxed muscles on its legs formed long flabby wrinkles, and spavins swelled its hairy hocks. Its withers, under the pressure of a collar from which all the stuffing had vanished, were covered with raw sores, and its thin flanks were rayed with the marks of the whiplash. Its face was an incarnation of melancholy and suffering; behind its eyes were sunken salt-cellars that might have been hollowed out with a dissecting knife; its blue eyes were filled with the dull, resigned, pensive expression of an overdriven animal; one could read in them sad indifference to blows, the result of useless efforts, and the crack of the lash failed to awaken an answering spark. Its limp ears, one of which had been split open, hung pitifully on either side its face and kept time by their flapping to the irregular rhythm of its gait. A wisp of hair, formerly white, but now yellow, stuck in the headstall, the leather of which rubbed on the bony cheekbones, brought out the more strongly by the poor brute's lean condition. From the nostrils dropped the sweat of its difficult breathing, while the tired lips hung down as if it were sulking.

A SNOW EFFECT

Perspiration had marked its white coat, dappled with bay, with lines like those made by rain upon plastered walls, made the hair under its belly stick together, washed its lower limbs and mingled hideously with the mud. Most pitiable was it to look at, and the pale horse on which Death is represented as riding in Revelation, would have appeared like a spirited steed, fit to parade in a joust, by the side of this worn and exhausted animal whose shoulders seemed to give way at every step, and whose sorrowful glance begged the favour of speedy death at the knacker's hands. The temperature was falling and it plodded on in a cloud of vapour that rose from its flanks and nostrils.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The three women only were in the waggon, the men walking in order not to overload the poor brute, with whose pace they could easily keep up, and which indeed they could readily distance. As none had any pleasant suggestions to make, they were all silent and walked apart, wrapping themselves in their cloaks as closely as they could.

Sigognac, almost discouraged, was wondering whether he would not have done better to remain in his ancestral home, ruined as it was, and to run the risk of starving to death in it by the side of his damaged escutcheon, in solitude and silence, than to be taking the chances of the road with strollers as he was actually doing. He thought of good old Peter, of Bayard, of Miraut, and of Beelzebub, the trusted companions of his long, weary hours, and in spite of himself his heart sank within him, and a nervous gasp, that usually ends in tears, choked him for a moment; but a glance at Isabella, huddled in her cloak and sitting on the front of the vehicle, renewed his courage. The young girl smiled at him; she did not appear to mind the wretchedness of their situation ; her heart was happy, so what mattered bodily suffering and fatigue ?

A SNOW EFFECT

The landscape itself was not calculated to dispel gloomy thoughts. In the foreground grew the twisted trunks of a number of old storm-beaten, distorted elms, their tops broken off, their network of black branches standing out against a lowering, yellowish-gray sky, threatening snow and shedding a livid light. In the middle distance, stretched an uncultivated plain, bounded by bare hills and russet woods. Here and there a hut, from which rose a faint wisp of smoke, showed like a chalkmark between the pole-fences. The ground was cut by the channel of a brook that formed a sort of cicatrice. In springtime, and clothed with verdure, the country would no doubt have looked attractive, but in winter's gray livery it was monotonous, dismal, and wretched. From time to time went by a wan and ragged peasant or old woman, bending under a faggot of dead wood ; yet far from giving life to the waste, they merely deepened the feeling of loneliness. Magpies, hopping about on the brown earth with their fan-like tails outspread, seemed to be the real inhabitants of the region ; they chattered as the waggon drew near as though they were passing remarks upon it, accompanying their twittering with derisive dances in front of the players, like wicked birds that they were, hardened against the sufferings of the wretched travellers.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

A bitter wind was blowing, biting the faces of the strollers and whipping their cloaks about them. The gusts of wind were soon accompanied by flakes of snow that rose and fell and mingled, without settling on anything, so violent were the blasts. The snow was so thick that at a short distance in front of the blinded wayfarers it looked like a white darkness, the silvery mist transforming the appearance of the nearest objects, that soon ceased to be distinguishable.

“The old lady above must be plucking geese and shaking the feathers down upon us,” said the Pedant, who was tramping on behind the waggon for shelter. “I should greatly prefer their flesh to their plumage, and I could eat it without lemon or spices.”

“Yea, even without salt,” answered the Tyrant, “for my stomach has wholly lost remembrance of the omelet made with eggs that chirped as they were being broken, and which I disposed of under the fallacious and sarcastic name of breakfast, in spite of the beaks that bristled in it.”

A SNOW EFFECT

Sigognac also had taken refuge behind the vehicle, and the Pedant turned to him, saying : —

“This is frightful weather, Baron, and for your sake I am sorry that you should be sharing our wretched plight, but it is only a passing misfortune, and although we are not making much progress, nevertheless we are drawing nearer to Paris.”

“I was not nurtured in the lap of luxury,” returned Sigognac, “and a few flakes of snow do not appal me. It is these poor ladies whom I pity, for in spite of their feebler strength they are compelled to bear with privations and fatigue like old travellers.”

“They have long been used to it, and what would be painful to ladies of rank or to townswomen does not particularly incommode them.”

The storm was now increasing ; driven by the gale the snow was drifting in clouds along the ground, stopping only when it met with some obstacle, such as a mound, a stone wall, a hedge, or a ditch. Then it would heap itself up with amazing rapidity, and speedily overflow on the other side of the temporary dike. At other times it was caught in the whirl of an eddy and curled up heavenwards to fall at once in heavy masses immediately blown away by the wind. In a few moments Isabella, Serafina, and dame Leonardo, though they had bestowed themselves in the most sheltered part of the waggon and were protected by the luggage under the flapping awning, were dusted all over with snow.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Bewildered by the driving snow and wind, the poor horse could scarcely make way against the blast ; it panted hard, its flanks heaved, and it slipped at every step. The Tyrant caught hold of the bridle, and walking alongside of it, helped it along, while the Pedant, Sigognac, and Scappino pushed at the wheels, Leander meanwhile cracking the whip, to urge on the animal ; as for striking it, that would have been unmitigated cruelty. The Swashbuckler had fallen behind, for he was such a light-weight, thanks to his phenomenal leanness, that the wind prevented his pushing on, although he had endeavoured to ballast himself with stones in his pockets and in each of his hands.

The snowstorm, instead of diminishing, was growing wilder and wilder, and blew furiously about the innumerable white flakes that were tossed hither and thither like the spume of the sea. It became so violent that the strollers were obliged to come to a stop and to turn the waggon round to leeward, anxious though they were to reach the village. The poor horse was done; its legs were growing stiff, and its smoking, perspiring coat was ruffled by shivers. If it had been called upon to make another attempt, it must have fallen dead; indeed a drop of blood was already showing on its nostrils widely dilated by its hard breathing, and its eyes were becoming glazed.

A SNOW EFFECT

It is easy enough to fancy the darkness full of terrors, for it readily inspires dread, but the horror of whiteness is less intelligible. Nevertheless, nothing could well be more sinister than the situation of the poor players, pale with hunger, blue with cold, blinded by the snow, and lost on the high-road in the mad whirl of icy particles that enshrouded them. The whole company had snuggled under the awning of the waggon until the squall should blow over, and pressed close to one another so as to keep as warm as possible.

At last the storm broke, and the snow, so long whirled through the air, was able to fall less tumultuously to the ground. As far as the eye could reach the landscape was covered with a white pall.

“Where is Hector?” queried Blazius. “Can the gale have whipped him off to the moon?”

“Yes, where is he?” added the Tyrant. “I cannot see anything of him, but perhaps he is lying sheltered under the scenery at the bottom of the waggon. Here, Swashbuckler! Wag your ears if you are asleep and answer to your name."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

But never a word did Captain Hector utter, nor did any one move under the heap of old scenery.

"Hallo, Hector!" roared the Tyrant again in his deepest tragedy-voice and with a volume of sound that would have wakened the Seven Sleepers and their dog.

"We have seen nothing of him," said the women; "and as the drifting snow was blinding us, we did not think anything of it, supposing he was close to the waggon."

"The devil!" said Blazius. "That is strange. I hope nothing has happened to him."

"No doubt," put in Sigognac, "he took shelter, when the storm was at its worst, behind the trunk of a tree, and he will soon catch up with us."

It was resolved to wait a few moments, and then, if he did not turn up, to start out in quest of him. Nothing showed on the road, against the white background of which, even though it was now becoming dark, a human form would have been easily perceived at a great distance. Night, which falls so early during the short December days, had already come on, but it was not quite black. The reflection of the snow diminished the obscurity of the sky, and by a strange opposition, it seemed that the light was produced by the earth. The horizon showed in clear, white lines, and did not vanish in misty distance. The whitened trees resembled the frosty efflorescence on window-panes, and from time to time the flakes of snow shaken down from a branch fell, like the silver tears on palls, upon the black curtain of the darkness. The sight was of the gloomiest; a dog began to howl by way of giving a voice to the desolate landscape and to express its dreadful melancholy. It does seem at times as though nature, tired of remaining mute, confides her secret woes to the moans of the wind or the howl of an animal.

A SNOW EFFECT

Every one knows how dismal sounds in the silence of night the desperate bark that ends in a rattle and that seems called forth by the passage of ghosts invisible to the human eye. The animal's instinct, communicating with the soul of things, foresees misfortune and bewails it even ere it has happened. Its howl, that is mingled with sobs, has in it the terror of the future, the dread of death, and the horror of the supernatural. The boldest man cannot hear it without a shudder and, as Job says, it makes the hair of the flesh stand up.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The howling, distant at first, had drawn nearer, and it was now possible to make out in the middle of the plain a great black dog, seated on its haunches, its head lifted to the sky and uttering its lamentable call.

"Something has happened to our poor friend," exclaimed the Tyrant; "that accursed brute is howling as if for the dead."

The women, seized with a presentiment of misfortune, devoutly crossed themselves, and tender-hearted Isabella began repeating a prayer.

"We must set out in search of him without further delay," said Blazius. "And we must take the lantern, so that it may be a beacon and a Polar star to him if he has strayed away off the road and is stumbling about in the fields; for in snowy weather such as this, which covers up the roads with a white pall, it is easy enough to lose one's self."

The flint was struck and the bit of candle in the lantern soon shed a light through the horn panes sufficiently bright to be seen at a distance.

The Tyrant, Blazius, and Sigognac started on the quest, Scappino and Leander remaining behind to guard the waggon and to reassure the women, who were beginning to get frightened at what had happened. The dog's persistent howling deepened the gloom of the scene, while with a low roaring the wind drove its aerial chariots over the land as if it were bearing away wandering spirits.

A SNOW EFFECT

The storm had so drifted the snow that all tracks had disappeared, or at least were nearly obliterated. The darkness added to the difficulty of the search, and when Blazius studied the ground in the light of the lantern, he would come upon the vast footprints of the Tyrant, deeply sunk in the snow, but he could not find those of the Swashbuckler, who, even had he managed to progress so far, would have made no deeper imprint than a bird.

They proceeded thus for nearly a mile, lifting the lantern up in order to enable the lost actor to see it, and shouting at the top of their voices, "Hector! Hector! Oh! Hector!"

But there was no response to the cries, which recalled the farewell to the dead which the ancients uttered ere leaving the tomb. Alone the silence was audible, or a frightened bird would fly away with sudden whirl of wings and quick call, and disappear farther away in the darkness, or else the hooting of an owl disturbed by the rays of the lantern sounded dolefully. At last Sigognac, who was very keen-sighted, thought he made out in the obscurity, at the foot of a tree, a curious shape, strangely stiff and dreadfully immobile. He informed his companions, who hastily followed him in that direction.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

It was indeed the poor Swashbuckler. He was leaning against the tree and his long legs outstretched on the ground were half buried in a snow-drift. His long rapier, from which he was never parted, formed so comical an angle with his body that it would have provoked laughter at any other time. He lay like a log as his comrades approached, and Blazius, made uneasy by his motionless attitude, flashed the light upon his face and nearly dropped the lantern, so terrified was he at the sight it revealed.

The face the beams illumined had lost the colouring of life; it was waxy white; the nose, pinched in by death's bony fingers, shone like a piece of cuttlefish, and the skin was drawn tight over the temples. Flakes of snow had caught on the eyebrows and eyelashes, the wide-open eyes were fixed in a glassy stare, while at each end of the mustaches hung an icicle that caused them to droop. The lips from which had flown so many amusing rodomontades were closed with the seal of eternal silence, and the death's-head, carved by emaciation, was already showing under the pale face, in which the custom of making grimaces had drawn horribly comical wrinkles that survived death itself; for it is one of the penalties of the player's profession that even death loses its solemnity in his case.

A SNOW EFFECT

Still clinging to hope, the Tyrant endeavoured to shake the Swashbuckler's hand, but the arm, already stiff, fell back with a sharp sound like the wooden arm of an automaton when the string is let go. The poor devil had left the stage of this world for that of the next. Yet unable to make up his mind that Captain Hector was really gone, the Tyrant asked Blazius if he had his flask about him. The Pedant never went without it; there were a few drops of wine left in it, and he applied it to the blue lips of the body, but they remained obstinately closed, and the red drops of the cordial filtered out at the corners of the mouth. The vital spark had fled for ever from the frail clay, for the faintest breath would have condensed into vapour in the bitterly cold air.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“Leave the poor fellow alone,” said Sigognac. “Do you not see that he is dead?”

“Alas! yes,” returned Blazius. “As dead as Cheops under his great pyramid. No doubt he was overcome by the blizzard, and being unable to struggle against the fury of the blast, he stopped by this tree, and thin as he was the cold quickly froze him to the marrow. In order to make a sensation in Paris, he had been eating less and less every day, and he was thinner than a greyhound after the hunting season is over. Poor Hector! you are safe now from all slaps, boxes on the ear, kicks and thrashings which your part required you to put up with. Nobody will ever laugh in your face again!”

“What are we to do with the body?” broke in the Tyrant. “We cannot leave it on top of the ditch to be picked to pieces by wolves, dogs, and birds, even though his flesh be but poor pittance that would scarce serve to feed the worms.”

“Of course we cannot leave him,” returned Blazius. “He was a true and faithful comrade, and as he is not heavy, you shall take the head, I will take the feet, and the pair of us shall carry him to the waggon. To-morrow, when daylight has returned, we shall bury him as decently as possible in some corner or other, seeing that our unnatural Mother Church closes the cemetery gates against us poor players and denies us the satisfaction of resting in consecrated ground. After spending our lives in entertaining the godliest people, we have to go and rot on a charnel like dead dogs and horses. Pray take the lantern and walk ahead of us, Baron."

A SNOW EFFECT

Sigognac nodded assent to the plan. The two players stooped down, cleared away the snow that already covered the Swashbuckler like a pall prematurely outspread, raised the lean corpse that weighed less than a child's body, and started, preceded by the Baron, who lighted the way with the lantern.

Fortunately no one was travelling along that way at the time, for a passer-by would have thought the funereal group, illumined by the wavering, reddish reflection of the lantern, and casting long, misshapen shadows upon the snow, a strange and mysterious sight indeed, and would naturally have concluded that it was a case of crime or witchcraft. The black dog had ceased to howl, as though it had done its duty in giving warning of the death. The silence of the tomb reigned over the land, for snow deadens sound.

Scappino, Leander, and the other players had caught sight of the little glowing red light swinging in Sigognac's hand and casting upon the surrounding objects sudden flashes that drew them out of the darkness in strange or formidable shapes until they again vanished in the shadows. Seen intermittently in the uncertain light, the figures of the Tyrant and Blazius, connected by the stiffened body of the Swashbuckler, as two words are connected by a hyphen, had a lugubrious and enigmatical appearance. Impelled by anxiety and curiosity, Scappino and Leander started to meet them.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

"Well, what is the matter?" said the former when they came up to their comrades. "Is Captain Hector ill that you are carrying him that way, as stiff as if he had swallowed his own rapier?"

"He is not ill," returned Blazius. "He is in the enjoyment of perfect health; neither gout, fever, catarrh, nor the stone can hurt him now. He is cured for ever of the disease for which no physician, whether Hippocrates, Galen, or Avicenna, has ever found a remedy. I mean life, which always ends by killing one."

"So he is dead!" said Scappino, in accents of sorrow and surprise, as he bent over the dead man's face.

"Quite dead; could n't be deader, supposing there are various degrees of deadness, for to the natural coldness of death is added in his case the coldness of frost," replied Blazius, in a voice that betrayed more emotion than his speech expressed.

A SNOW EFFECT

"He is no more! as the confidants say at the end of a tragedy," added the Tyrant. "But please relieve us; it is your turn to carry him. We have borne our poor comrade long enough, and without expectation of vails or tips either."

Scappino took the Tyrant's place, Leander that of Blazius, little as he cared for that sort of mortuary job, and the procession started afresh. In a few minutes they reached the waggon, stalled in the road. Isabella and Serafina had, spite of the cold, got out from the vehicle, in which the duenna alone was squatting and opening wide her owl-like eyes. At the sight of the Swashbuckler, white, stiff, frozen, on his features the motionless mask through which the soul no longer looks forth, the actresses uttered a cry of terror and grief. Tears sprang from Isabella's clear eyes and were at once frozen on her cheeks by the bitter night blast. She clasped her lovely hands, reddened by the cold, and a fervent prayer for the repose of the soul of him who had so suddenly vanished through the trap-door of eternity rose on the wings of faith into the depths of the sombre sky.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

What was to be done? The situation was rather embarrassing, the village where the company had intended to spend the night being still four or five miles distant. It was certain that by the time they could reach it every house would long since have been shut up and the inhabitants asleep. On the other hand, it was impossible to remain stuck in the snow in the road without wood to light a fire with, without food to comfort the living, and to await daybreak, which came very late at that season, in the gruesome company of a dead body.

A start was resolved upon, the hour's rest and a feed of oats administered to the poor old worn-out horse by Scappino having restored some strength to the animal, which looked brighter and capable of doing the distance. The body of Captain Hector was placed in the bottom of the waggon and covered with a cloth. The actresses, shivering a little with fright, placed themselves in the front part; for death turns the friend with whom one was but now chatting into a spectre, and he who had been entertaining now terrifies as might a hobgoblin or a bogy.

A SNOW EFFECT

The men tramped on foot, Scappino lighting the way with the lantern, into which a fresh candle had been put, and the Tyrant holding the horse's bridle to prevent its stumbling. They did not make very rapid progress, for the going was bad ; nevertheless, in the course of a couple of hours they made out, at the foot of a steep hill, the outer houses of the village. The snow that covered the roofs made them stand out against the sombre background of sky in spite of the darkness. The alert watch-dogs, hearing in the distance the clanking of the iron-work of the waggon, bayed loudly, and their barking awoke other dogs in the isolated farms afar off. This produced a concert of howls, some low, some shrill, with solos, responses, and choruses, in which the entire canine population of the countryside took part, so that when the waggon reached the village the whole place was up and awake. More than one night-capped head showed in the windows or the upper panels of half-open doors, making it easier for the Pedant to carry on negotiations tending to secure lodging for the company.

He was told where the inn stood, or at least the house which did duty as an inn, for travellers did not frequent the place, being accustomed to push on farther.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

It was at the other end of the village, and the poor horse had to buckle to it again; but it smelt the stable and with a tremendous effort it struck sparks from the stones through the snow.

The place could not be mistaken; a holly-bush hung over the door, not unlike the boughs that dip into lustral waters, and Scappino, raising his lantern, made sure of the presence of the symbol of hospitality. The Tyrant drummed on the door with his big fists, and soon the clatter of pattens descending the stairs was heard within. A ray of reddish light filtered through the cracks of the door, which opened and exhibited, in all the repulsiveness of a most unattractive négligé, an old woman whose withered hand, shading the trembling flame of a penny dip, seemed to be catching fire. She showed the players into the kitchen, placed the candle upon the table, stirred up the ashes on the hearth to start a few glowing cinders that soon set fire to a handful of brushwood, and then returned to her room to put on a skirt and jacket. A stout lad, rubbing his eyes with his dirty hands, opened the gates of the yard, drove in the waggon, unharnessed the horse, and stabled it.

“Look here,” said Blazius, “we cannot leave poor

A SNOW EFFECT

Hector in the waggon like a dead deer after a day's hunting. The dogs would be sure to get at him. After all, he received Christian baptism, and he deserves to be waked like the good Christian that he was."

The body of the dead comedian was therefore brought in, stretched upon the table and respectfully covered with a cloak. Under the great folds of the stuff showed the stiff lines of the body and the sharp profile of the face, that was even more terrifying thus than when it was uncovered. The consequence was that when the old hostess entered the room she nearly fainted with terror at the sight of the corpse, which she took for that of a man murdered by the players. Holding out her trembling old hands, she besought the Tyrant, whom she looked upon as the leader of the band, not to put her to death, promising to maintain absolute secrecy, even were she to be tortured. Isabella reassured her, and told her briefly what had happened. The old woman then fetched a couple more candles, and placed them symmetrically round the corpse, offering to watch the dead with dame Leonardo, for she had often prepared the village dead for burial and knew what needed to be done on such sad occasions.

These matters settled, the players withdrew to another room, where they made a pretence of supping, for the lugubrious scenes they had just taken part in and the death of the worthy Hector were not calculated to give them an appetite. Probably for the first time in his life, Blazius, good as the wine was, left his glass half-full, having forgotten to drink it down. He must certainly have been deeply afflicted, for he was of the breed of wine-bibbers that ask to be buried under a barrel so that the spigot may drip into their mouths, and he would have risen in his coffin to answer the call of "A bumper, and no heel-taps!"

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Isabella and Serafina had a cot in the neighbouring room; the men lay down upon bundles of straw brought in by the stable-boy, but every one slept badly and was up betimes, for the Swashbuckler had to be buried.

For lack of a sheet, Leonardo and the hostess had made a shroud for him out of a piece of an old drop-scene, representing a forest; a winding-sheet worthy of an actor, as is a military cloak of a warrior. A few traces of green paint on the threadbare canvas simulated wreaths and foliage, and looked like armfuls of grass cast upon it in honour of the corpse that was bundled and sewn up into the shape of an Egyptian mummy.

A SNOW EFFECT

The bier was formed of a plank placed upon two stretchers, the ends of which were taken by the Tyrant, Blazius, Scappino, and Leander. A long, black, velvet robe, covered with spangle-stars and half-moons, and which was used for the costumes of pontiffs and necromancers, made a fairly decent pall.

In this order the procession went out by a back door opening out upon the fields, in order to avoid the attention and the remarks of the curious-minded, and proceeded towards a piece of waste ground which the hostess had pointed out as a place where the Swash-buckler might be buried without any one objecting, for it was the spot where animals that had died of disease were thrown. No doubt it was a most unfit place for the interment of a human being, but the canons of the Church were plain, and a player, being excommunicated, could not rest in consecrated ground unless he had given up the stage, its works and its pomps, which certainly was not the case with Captain Hector.

Gray-eyed Morn was just awakening and was coming down the slope of the hills in the snow. A cold light fell upon the plain, the whiteness of which made the pale tones of the heavens look livid. Surprised at the strange appearance of the procession, unaccompanied by cross or priest, a few peasants, on their way to pick up fallen branches, stopped and looked askance at the strollers, suspecting them to be heretics, sorcerers, or Calvinists, yet not daring to interfere. At last a fairly open spot was reached, and the stable-boy, who carried the spade with which the grave was to be dug, said it would be well to stop there. The ground was strewn with carcasses of animals half-covered with snow; skeletons of horses, picked clean by the vultures and the crows, stretched out their long fleshless heads with empty sockets, and the vertebræ of their necks; their ribs, bare as bare could be, opening out like the leaves of a fan the paper of which has been torn away. Touches of snow fantastically fallen increased still more the horror of the charnel by bringing out the projections and the articulations of the bones. It seemed like a collection of the chimerical animals which harpies and ghouls bestride in the cavalcades of the witches' sabbaths.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The players laid the body on the ground, and the stable-boy began to dig vigorously, throwing the spadefuls of black earth upon the snow, — a peculiarly repellent performance, for the living cannot help thinking that the dead, though past all feeling, must be colder under the layer of frost which is to cover them on their first night in the grave.

A SNOW EFFECT

The Tyrant took turns with the lad, and the grave was being rapidly dug. It yawned already sufficiently wide to swallow the poor body at a mouthful, when the peasantry, who had drawn near, began to yell "Huguenots!" and seemed about to assault the players. They even threw a few stones, which, happily, hit no one. Seized with anger against the rabble, Sigognac flashed out his sword and fell upon the rascals, striking them with the flat and threatening them with the point. Hearing the row, the Tyrant sprang from the grave, caught hold of one of the stretchers, and laid on handsomely upon the backs of those overthrown by the Baron's impetuous charge. The band scattered with howls and curses, and the obsequies of poor Hector were concluded.

Lying at the bottom of the hole, the corpse, sewn up in the piece of forest scenery, looked more like an arquebuse wrapped in green serge and buried for concealment than like a human body committed to its last resting-place. When the first shovelfuls of earth fell upon the poor remains of the dead actor, the Pedant, unable to master his emotion and to keep back a tear that rolled down his red nose and fell into the grave like a pearl of the heart, uttered in a doleful voice by way of funeral discourse, "Alas! poor Hector!" And this was the dirge and threnody of the deceased.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The worthy Pedant, as he spoke the words, did not suspect that he was repeating the very words of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, as he addressed the skull of Yorick, the former court-jester, as may be seen in Master William Shakespeare's tragedy, a poet well known in England and patronised by Queen Elizabeth.

In a few minutes the grave was filled up; the Tyrant spread snow over it, to conceal the spot and prevent any outrage being perpetrated upon the body. This done —

"Now," he said, "let us be off smartly; there is nothing more we can do here. Back to the inn, and let us away as fast as we may, for the rascals, returning in greater numbers, might attack us. Neither your sword nor my fists would suffice to defend our party, for a host of pygmies can overcome a giant. Victory itself would be inglorious and profitless, for even were you to dispose of half a dozen of these louts, your glory would not grow thereby and the killing of the fellows would get us into trouble. We should have the wailing of widows and the howls of children, a wearisome and pitiful performance that lawyers turn to account to influence the judges.”

A SNOW EFFECT

The advice was sound and it was followed. An hour later, the bill having been settled, the waggon had started again.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

VII

WHICH JUSTIFIES THE TITLE OF THIS NOVEL

AT first the company proceeded as rapidly as the strength of the horse, refreshed by a good feed and a night spent in the stable, and the condition of the road covered with new-fallen snow allowed. The peasants manhandled by Sigognac and the Tyrant, might attack the party in greater numbers, and it was desirable to get sufficiently far from the village to render pursuit useless. So some six miles were travelled in silence, for the sad end of the Swash-buckler added sombre thoughts to the melancholy situation. Every one reflected that it might be his or her fate some day to be buried like that by the roadside, among dead animals, and given over to profanation. The waggon pursuing its way was symbolical of life, that ever goes on without troubling about those who cannot follow and fall dying or dead in the ditches. But the symbol brought out more vividly the hidden meaning, and Blazius, whose tongue was itching to talk, began to moralise on this theme with endless quotations, apothegms, and maxims with which he had stored his memory as he learned his parts.

WHICH JUSTIFIES

The Tyrant listened to him without uttering a word and with a preoccupied look. His thoughts were running in another channel, and Blazius at last noticed his comrade's anxious expression and asked him what he was thinking of.

"I am thinking," replied the Tyrant, "of Milo of Croton, who killed an ox with one blow of his fist, and ate up the animal in a single day. I feel capable of repeating the feat, in which I much delight."

"Unfortunately we have not got the ox," put in Scappino, taking part in the conversation.

"True," returned the Tyrant. "I have but the fist — and the appetite. Oh ! happy the ostrich that feeds on pebbles, pieces of broken glass, gaiter-buttons, knife-handles, belt-buckles, and other victuals indigestible by man. At this present moment I could swallow every one of our stage properties. I feel as if while digging poor Hector's grave I dug one within myself, so deep, so long, and so wide that it can never be filled up. Wise indeed were the ancients who followed up funerals with repasts plentifully furnished with viands and copiously watered with wine, to the greater glory of the dead and the improvement of the health of the living. I should love to perform even now that philosophical rite so well fitted to dry our tears."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

"In other words," said Blazius, "you would like to eat. You Polyphemus, you ogre, you Gargantua, you Gouliaf, you disgust me."

"You," retorted the Tyrant, "would mighty well like to drink. You sand-pit, you funnel, you wine-skin, you barrel, you siphon, you hogshhead, you excite my pity."

"How delightful would a combination of these two principles prove at table!" said Scappino, conciliatingly. "Here is by the roadside a clump of wood admirably adapted to a halt. We might turn the waggon in there, and if there be any food left, we might eat it, such as it is, sheltered from the north wind by that natural screen. The stop will give the horse time to rest and us to discuss, while nibbling our crusts, the future of our company, a future that strikes me as pretty dark at this moment."

"Wisely spoken, friend Scappino," returned the

WHICH JUSTIFIES

Pedant. "We shall draw from the depths of the provision bag, which, alas! is flabbier and more limp than a prodigal's purse, a few remains of the good cheer of other days; the crust of pasties, a ham-bone, the skins of sausages, and crusts of bread. In the box there are left two or three flagons of wine, the last of a valiant company. With the help of these we may, not satisfy, but at least fool our hunger. Pity 't is that the soil of this inhospitable district is not like the clay that certain American Indians ballast themselves with when both hunting and fishing have proved a failure!"

The waggon was driven off the road into the thicket, and the horse, having been unharnessed, sought under the snow for scanty blades of grass it nibbled with its long yellow teeth. A carpet was spread upon an open space, the players sat down round this improvised table-cloth in Turkish fashion, and Blazius placed upon it in due order the remains of former meals that he had brought along in the waggon, as solemnly as if he were setting out a regular feast.

"Admirably done!" exclaimed the Tyrant, delighted at the sight. "A prince's majordomo could not have done better. Although you are wonderful as a Pedant, Blazius, your real vocation was that of steward."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“Such was my ambition, I own, but adverse fortune came in the way,” returned the Pedant in modest tones. “I particularly recommend you, my dear hungry friends, not to fall to like gluttons. Masticate slowly and devoutly. For the matter of that, I shall myself divide the rations among you, as is done on rafts after a shipwreck. To you, Tyrant, I assign this ham-bone, from which still depends a morsel of meat. With your strong teeth you can break it and in philosophical fashion extract the marrow from it. Your share, ladies, shall be this bottom crust of the pasty, overlaid with dressing in the corners and internally fortified with a layer of bacon; it is a delicate, savoury dish, so nutritious that you will not care for anything more after it. This butt-end of a sausage is for you, Baron de Sigognac; only you must be careful not to swallow the string which fastens the skin after the manner of purse-strings. You must lay it aside for supper; for dinner is an indigestible, abusive, and superfluous meal which is hereby suppressed. Leander, Scappino, and I will make shift with this venerable piece of cheese, as hairy as a hermit in his grot. As for the bread, those who find it too hard may soak it in water and extract the straws from it if they want tooth-picks. In regard to the wine, each member of the company is entitled to one glass, and as cellarer, I have to insist on no heel-taps, so that there may be no loss of liquor."

WHICH JUSTIFIES

Sigognac had long been inured to more than Spanish frugality, and in his Tower of Hunger had made many a meal which left no crumbs for the mice to nibble, seeing he was the chief mouse in person. Nevertheless, he could not help admiring the bright temper and the comic spirit of the Pedant, who found food for fun under circumstances in which other men would have bemoaned their hard fate and wept over it. But he was worried about Isabella; a deadly pallor overspread her cheeks, and her teeth chattered as she ate with a feverish clanking she in vain endeavoured to repress. Her thin clothing ill-protected her against the bitter cold, and Sigognac, seated by her side, threw round her shoulders, in spite of her protestations, the half of his cloak, and drew her close to himself, so that the warmth of his own body should cheer and revive her. Isabella warmed up quickly by her lover's side, and a faint flush reappeared on her modest features.

While the strollers were eating a curious sound was heard, to which at first no attention was paid, as it was supposed to be caused by the wind whistling through the bare branches of the coppice. Soon it became more distinct ; it was a sort of hoarse and strident rattle, at once stupid and angry, the character of which it was difficult to determine. The women exhibited signs of alarm.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“It may be an adder!” exclaimed Serafina. “I shall die of fright, for those horrid creatures terrify me.”

“Serpents are benumbed in such weather,” replied Leander, “and sleep sound as logs in their holes.”

“Leander is right,” put in the Pedant. “It must be something else ; some wild animal disturbed by our presence here. There is no reason why it should spoil our meal.”

At the sound of the hissing, Scappino had pricked up his foxy ears, which though reddened by the cold had lost none of their acuteness of hearing, and he cast a piercing glance in the direction from which the noise came. The grass was disturbed as by the passage of an animal. Scappino signed to the players to remain still, and presently there emerged from the thicket a superb gander, with neck outstretched, head up, and waddling along with majestic stupidity upon its broad-webbed feet. Two geese, its wives, followed it trustfully and confidently.

WHICH JUSTIFIES

“There is a roast coming to the spit of its own accord,” whispered Scappino. “Heaven, touched by our agony of hunger, has sent it to us most timeously.”

The clever rascal rose and moved away from the rest of the company, describing a semicircle so lightly that the snow did not even creak under his steps. The gander’s attention was attracted by the group of players that it watched with mistrustful curiosity, the reason of their presence in a place ordinarily deserted not being quite clear to its unintelligent brain. Seeing that the bird was absorbed in its contemplation, the player, who apparently was used to marauding, stole up behind the gander and covered it up with his cloak so accurately, skilfully, and quickly that the business was done in less time than it takes to tell it.

Having secured the fowl, he sprang upon it and seized it by the neck under the cloak, which the flapping of the wings of the poor suffocated bird speedily threw off. In this attitude Scappino resembled that much admired group of antique sculpture called “The Boy and the Goose.” Soon the choking gander ceased to struggle ; its head fell limp upon Scappino’s closed fist ; its wings no longer flapped ; its legs, with their orange-morocco gaiters, stretched out in a dying kick ; it was no more. The widowed geese, dreading a like fate, uttered by way of funeral dirge a lamentable quack and fled into the coppice.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“Well done, Scappino ! a clever trick, by my faith, and worth more than all those you play on the stage. Geese are more difficult to fool than Gérontes and Truffaldinis, being naturally very vigilant and constantly on the alert, as we learn in history, which teaches us that the geese of the Capitol scented the night attack of the Gauls and thus saved Rome. This noble gander saves us also in another, but no less providential fashion.”

Dame Leonardo bled and plucked the fowl, and while she was doing her best to remove the down, Blazius, the Tyrant, and Leander, scattered in the thickets, collected dead wood, shook off the snow from it and heaped it up in a dry spot. Meantime Scappino was busy cutting a wand with his knife and stripping off the bark, so as to make it into a spit. Two forked sticks, cut above the knot, were driven into the ground to serve as supports and andirons. With the help of a handful of straw taken from the chariot and on which the flint and steel was struck, the fire was speedily lighted and soon blazed merrily, colouring the spitted bird with its flame and restoring by its vivifying warmth the company seated in a circle round the hearth.

WHICH JUSTIFIES

Scappino, with the modest look of a man who feels that he is the hero of the hour, stood in his place, with downcast eyes and devout face, turning the bird from time to time as, under the influence of the glowing coals, it assumed a fine golden colour, most appetising to behold, and gave forth a scent so succulent that it would have caused Cataligirone, who, in the whole extent of the fair city of Paris, admired nothing so much as the cook-shops of the Rue aux Oûes, to fall into a state of ecstasy.

The Tyrant had risen and was striding about in order, he said, to avoid yielding to the temptation of falling upon the half-cooked roast and swallowing it, spit and all, while Blazius had gone to the waggon to get out from a box a huge pewter platter used in stage banquets. The goose was placed thereon with much solemnity, and as soon as the knife was stuck into it, it gave out a sanguineous gravy that smelled most exquisitely.

The fowl was cut up into equal portions, and the meal was resumed anew. This time the food was no longer imaginary and fallacious, and no one felt any scruple concerning Scappino's action, for hunger had deadened every conscience. The Pedant, who was most particular in matters culinary, asked to be forgiven for not having slices of Seville oranges to serve with the goose, that condiment, as every one knows, being obligatory ; but he was readily forgiven.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“And now that we are satisfied,” said the Tyrant, as he wiped his beard with his hand, “it would not be out of the way to discuss our future movements. I have not much more than three or four pistoles in my bag, and my office of treasurer is fast becoming a sine-cure. We have lost two valuable members of the company, Zerbina and the Swashbuckler; and even had we not done so, we could not well perform in the open country for the benefit of the crows, ravens, and magpies. They would not pay for their seats, having no money of their own, save, it may be, the pies, which are reputed to steal coin, jewellery, spoons, and mugs; yet it would not be wise to reckon upon profits from this source. With the apocalyptic horse that is trying not to die in the shafts of our waggon, we cannot possibly reach Poitiers for a couple of days. Now this is most tragical, for we run the risk of starving to death or being frozen stiff in a ditch before then, seeing that it is not every day roast geese emerge from the bushes.”

WHICH JUSTIFIES

“You have admirably stated the trouble we are in,” said the Pedant, “but you have not said how we are to get out of it.”

“My advice is that we should halt in the first village we come to. Field work has stopped, and the long evenings have set in. We can surely secure the loan of some barn or stable. Scappino shall play the drum in front of the door, and promise a wonderful and unrivalled performance to the open-eyed yokels, who shall furthermore be graciously allowed to pay their entrance-money in kind. A chicken, a piece of ham or meat, or a measure of wine shall entitle the payer to a front seat. A couple of pigeons, a dozen eggs, a bunch of vegetables, a loaf of household bread, or similar victuals shall admit to the back seats. Peasants grudge paying out money, but they do not mind paying with the provisions they have in their hutches, for they cost them nothing, provided as they are by kindly Dame Nature. We shall not fill our purses, it is true, but we shall at least fill our stomachs, an important matter, since it is on Gaster that the whole economy and health of the body depend, as has been wisely remarked by Menenius. After that we ought not to have any difficulty in reaching Poitiers, where I am acquainted with an innkeeper who will give us credit."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

"But what play are we to perform?" inquired Scappino; "that is, supposing we come upon a village. Our repertory is badly disarranged. Tragedies and tragi-comedies would be Greek to rustics who are ignorant of fable and history, and who do not even understand the beautiful French tongue. What we need is a rattling, jolly farce, seasoned not with Attic but with kitchen salt, with lots of stick play, kicks, comical tumbles, and buffoon scurrilities in the Italian fashion. 'The Rodomontades of Captain Hector' would have been the very thing, but unfortunately the Swashbuckler is no more, and it is to the worms alone that he will henceforth spout his tirades."

As Scappino ceased, Sigognac signed with the hand that he desired to speak. A faint blush, the last despatched from the heart to the cheeks by his aristocratic pride, flushed his features, usually colourless even under the biting breeze. The players remained silently awaiting his words.

"Though I lack poor Hector's talent, I am almost as lean as he was. I propose, therefore, to take his part and to fill it to the best of my ability. I am your comrade; I mean to be so completely. Besides, I am ashamed to have profited by your good luck and to be useless to you now that times are bad. Then who cares for the Sigognacs? My ancestral home is falling in ruins upon the tombs of my forbears; forgetfulness is overwhelming our name, famous of yore, and the ivy is growing over my escutcheon upon my deserted porch. It may be that some day the three storks will joyously spread out their silver wings and that life and happiness will return to the poor dwelling where I have spent my sad and hopeless youth, but meanwhile I ask you, who held out your hands to me to help me out of that hole, to accept me frankly as your comrade. Henceforth I am no longer Sigognac."

WHICH JUSTIFIES

Isabella laid her hand on the Baron's arm as if desirous of interrupting him, but Sigognac paid no attention to the young girl's beseeching look, and went on: —

"I fold away my title of Baron and put it at the bottom of my trunk as a garment that is no longer suitable for wear. Do not again call me Baron, and let me see whether, thus disguised, misfortune will continue to know me. Now do I succeed to the Swashbuckler, and my stage name shall be Captain Fracasse!"

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“Long live Captain Fracasse!” shouted the company in assent, “and may he be applauded wherever he goes!”

Sigognac’s resolve, which surprised the players, was not so sudden as it seemed to be. He had long turned the matter over in his mind; it was painful to him to be a charge to the kindly strollers who shared their own resources so generously with him, never making him feel that he was a burden, and he had come to the conclusion that it was less unworthy of a nobleman to tread the boards and honestly earn his living than to accept it as an idler in the form of sportula or alms. He had indeed thought of returning to Sigognac, but had dismissed the idea as base and cowardly, for it is not in time of rout that a soldier should leave his command. Besides, even could he have made up his mind to go, his love for Isabella would have kept him back, and in addition, though he did not easily indulge his imagination, he fancied in a vague way that all manner of surprising adventures, changes of fortune and strokes of luck might befall him, and these possibilities he would have had to give up if he resumed his old solitary life within his ruinous castle.

The matter having thus been disposed of, the horse was again harnessed and a fresh start made. The whole company had been revived by the meal, and all, save the duenna and Serafina, who never went on foot when they could drive, walked behind the waggon, to the great relief of the poor animal. Isabella leaned on Sigognac's arm and turned upon him at times a loving glance, for she was sure that it was love for her that had induced him to turn actor, a step so repugnant to the pride of a well-born man. She had meant to scold him for it, but she had not the heart to blame him for a mark of devotion that she would have had him withhold had she foreseen his intention; for she was of those who forget themselves and think only of the interests of the man they love. Presently, feeling somewhat tired, she climbed into the waggon and curled herself up under a blanket by the duenna's side.

WHICH JUSTIFIES

On both sides of the road the country, covered with snow, was deserted as far as the eye could reach. There was no sign of town, village, or hamlet.

"There does not seem to be much hope of a full house," said the Pedant after glancing over the distance, "for there does not appear to be much of a public, and the pickled pork, fowls, and strings of onions with which the Tyrant was making our mouths water a while ago strike me as becoming more and more remote. I cannot see the smoke of a single chimney, and as far as my vision reaches I behold not the meanest of weather-cocks."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

"Do not be impatient, Blazius," returned the Tyrant, "and remember that crowded dwellings vitiate the air. It is healthful to place villages well apart."

"At that rate, the people of this district need not fear epidemics, black plague, dysentery, diarrhœa, or malignant and confluent fevers, which, according to physicians, are due to the crowding of the population. But I am very much afraid that if this sort of thing goes on Captain Fracasse will not have a very early opportunity of making his first appearance on any stage."

Meanwhile day was rapidly drawing to a close, and it was scarcely possible to distinguish in the heavy bank of clouds a faint red flush that marked the spot where the sun was setting, tired of illuminating the livid and gloomy landscape dotted with crows.

The snow, hardened by the cold wind, gleamed and glittered. The poor old horse found it increasingly hard to get along; the least slope made it slip, and though it braced itself to the best of its ability on its broken-kneed legs and held back with its thin quarters, the weight of the waggon overbore it, notwithstanding the fact that Scappino, walking at its head, held it up by the bridle. Cold as it was, the perspiration streamed down its ribs and debilitated limbs, turning to lather where the harness rubbed it. The animal panted like the bellows of a forge, a strange dazed look came into its eyes that seemed to behold phantoms, and it swerved now and then as if stopped by an invisible obstacle. Its shaky frame bumped in drunken fashion now against the one shaft, now against the other; it raised its head and drew its lips up over its gums, and then bent down as if to graze on the snow. Its last hour had struck and it was fighting death standing, like the brave horse it was. At last it went down all of a heap, feebly lashed out for the last time at death, lay down on its side, and never rose again.

WHICH JUSTIFIES

Terrified by the sudden jolt that nearly threw them to the ground, the women uttered shrieks of distress; the men hastened to their aid and quickly relieved them from their awkward position. Neither Leonardo nor Serafina were hurt, but the violence of the shock had caused Isabella to faint. Sigognac lifted her up inert and senseless, while Scappino, bending down, felt the ears of the horse, lying flat on the earth as if it were cut out of cardboard.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“It is dead and gone, and no mistake,” said Scappino, rising with a look of discouragement ; “its ears are cold, and the pulse in the auricular vein has ceased to beat.”

“So, then,” exclaimed Leander mournfully, “we shall now have to hang on to a rope like beasts of burden or boatmen hauling a boat, and to drag the waggon along. Cursed be the fancy that led me to turn player !”

“This is no time to weep and moan,” roared the Tyrant, exasperated by the young man’s unseasonable lamentations. “Let us be men, and decide, like men whom fate cannot dismay, what we had best do. First and foremost, let us ascertain if our good Isabella is much hurt. But no ; she is opening her eyes and coming to, thanks to the help of Sigognac and dame Leonardo. Well, then, we must divide into two parties ; the one shall stay by the waggon with the women, and the other shall scour the country in search of help, for we are not Russians inured to Scythian cold, and consequently we cannot remain here in winter quarters, squatting in the snow. We should need furs to do that, and dawn would find us frozen stiff and covered with ice, like candied fruit. Come, Captain Fracasse, Leander, and you Scappino, who are the lightest and as swift-footed as Achilles Peleades, leg it as fast as you can, run like hares, and bring us speedily some assistance. Blazius and I shall mount guard over the vehicle."

WHICH JUSTIFIES

The three men were making ready to start, although they had no great hopes of accomplishing anything, for the night was as black as the inside of an oven, and the reflection of the snow alone enabled one to distinguish objects. Darkness, however, if it conceals objects, also brings out light more strongly, and just then a little reddish dot began to glimmer at the foot of a hill some distance from the road.

"Behold the star of safety!" cried the Pedant; "the terrestrial star, as welcome to the sight of the lost wayfarer as the Polar star to sailors in peril of the sea. That star with its blessed rays is a candle or a lamp behind a window-pane, and indicates a well closed room, comfortably warmed, and forming part of a dwelling inhabited by civilised human beings rather than by savage Lestrigonians. There is undoubtedly a bright fire blazing on the hearth, and on the fire a pot wherein is cooking a rich soup; most luscious thought, that makes my mouth water, as, in fancy, I wash it down with two or three bottles of old crusty wine draped in antique fashion with cobwebs.”

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“ You are raving, old man,” said the Tyrant. “ The cold is congealing the gray matter of your brain in your old bald head and makes you see visions. There is, however, this much truth in your ravings, that the light does indicate an inhabited house, and our plan of campaign is therefore changed. We shall all proceed together towards that beacon of salvation ; it is scarcely likely that thieves are abroad on a night like this for the purpose of carrying off our forest, our public square, and our drawing-room. Let us each take our own things, which make a light bundle, and to-morrow morning we shall come back to fetch the waggon. Indeed, I am getting so miserably cold that my nose is losing all feeling.”

The players set off, Isabella leaning on Sigognac’s arm, Leander assisting Serafina, Scappino dragging the duenna along, and Blazius and the Tyrant forming the vanguard. They cut across the fields, straight for the light, bothered at times by bushes or ditches, and occasionally sinking in the snow nearly to the knees. At last, after more than one tumble, they reached a large building surrounded by long walls, with a waggon gate. The place looked like a farm-house, so far as they could make out in the darkness.

WHICH JUSTIFIES

The lamp cast a bright square patch of light upon the dark wall and revealed the sash of a small window the shutter of which had not yet been closed. The watch-dogs, having scented the approach of strangers, tumbled out and began to bark. They could be heard running, leaping, and scrambling about in the silence of the night behind the wall; then steps and voices of men mingled with the baying, and presently the whole place was aroused.

“Do you remain at a distance, most of you,” said the Pedant. “Our numbers might perhaps frighten these worthy people, who will think we are a band of roughs seeking to invade their rustic homes. As I am old and of kindly aspect, I shall go alone and knock at the door, and negotiate with them. They will not be afraid of me.”

This wise advice was followed. Blazius, crooking his fore-finger, knocked at the door, which was first partially opened and then thrown wide open. From the spot where they stood in the snow, the players beheld a rather strange and, to them, inexplicable sight.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The Pedant and the farmer, who had raised his lantern to throw its light upon the face of the man who had thus disturbed him, began, after exchanging a few words which the actors were unable to catch, to gesticulate in most eccentric fashion and to hurl themselves into each other's arms, as is the wont on the stage of two persons who recognise each other.

Encouraged by this reception, the meaning of which they could not fathom, but which they judged, from the pantomime that accompanied it, to be warm and favourable, the players drew near timidly, assuming a woe-begone and modest air, as becomed travellers in distress seeking hospitality.

“Come on, you people!” shouted the Pedant joyously. “Come on without fear. We have lighted upon a child of the stage, a pet of Thespis, a favourite of Thalia, the comic Muse, upon the famous Bellombre, in a word, formerly the delight of the Court and the city, as well as of the provinces. You are all familiar with his unsurpassed fame. Return thanks to kind fate that has led us straight to the philosopher's retreat, where the glory of the stage is resting upon his laurels.”

“Come in, ladies and gentlemen,” said Bellombre, advancing towards the players with the graceful courtesy of a man who has not put aside his fine manners though wearing a peasant's dress. "The chill night air might make you hoarse, and modest though my home is, you will nevertheless be more comfortable in it than in the open air."

WHICH JUSTIFIES

It will readily be believed that the company required no pressing, and that they entered the house delighted with the adventure, in which, for the matter of that, the only extraordinary thing was the appositeness of the recognition. Blazius had once belonged to the same troupe as Bellombre, and their respective parts precluding any rivalry between them, they had learned to appreciate each other and had become great friends through a community of affection for the bottle. Bellombre, who had taken to the stage after a very turbulent youth, had withdrawn from it, having inherited the farm and surrounding land at his father's death. As his parts called for a youthful appearance, he had not been sorry to leave before wrinkles compelled him to give up. People thought him dead long since, and old amateurs enjoyed worrying young actors by holding him up as an example.

The players entered into a large room that, as is usual in farm-houses, was at one and the same time a bedroom and a kitchen. A chimney with broad mantel, the shelf of which was hung with a border of faded green serge, took up one of the sides. A brick arch in the brown, varnished wall formed the opening of the oven, just then closed with a sheet-iron door. On huge iron andirons, the hollowed balls of which were fitted to hold plates, blazed with delightful crackling four or five huge logs, or rather tree trunks. The light of this splendid fire illumined the room so brilliantly that the lamp was unnecessary. The reflection of the flame showed in the shadow the outline of a bedstead of Gothic form, ran in brilliant rays along the beams of the ceiling, cast from the legs of the table placed in the centre of the room shadows of the most bizarre form, and flashed in sudden spangles upon the corners of the earthenware and the utensils ranged on the dresser or hung on the walls.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

In a corner near the window two or three books thrown upon a carved wooden table proved that the master of the house had not turned wholly into a rustic and that he devoted to reading, a souvenir of his former profession, the leisure time of the long winter evenings.

Revived by the warm atmosphere and the hospitable

WHICH JUSTIFIES

welcome, the whole company experienced a sensation of comfort. The rosy flush of life reappeared on the pale faces and on the lips chapped by the cold ; gaiety illumined the eyes but now lustreless, and hope sprang anew in every breast. The squinting, lame, and annoying god of ill-luck had at last wearied of persecuting the strollers, and appeased, doubtless, by the death of the Swashbuckler, it condescended to be satisfied with that meagre prey.

Bellombre had summoned his servants, who covered the tablecloth with plates and big-bellied jugs, to the intense delight of Blazius, who had been born thirsty, and was ever ready to imbibe, even in the depth of night.

“Now you see,” said he to the Tyrant, “how logical were my deductions from the sight of the little gleam of red light. They were neither a mirage nor a phantasm. Behold the rich vapour that ascends in spirals from the soup abundantly plenished with cabbage, turnips, and other vegetables. The wine, newly drawn, is sparkling red and bright in jugs crowned with rosy foam. The fire is blazing the brighter because of the cold outside, and to top it all, we have for our host the great, the illustrious, and never sufficiently to be praised Bellombre, the very flower and cream of players past, present, and to come ; be this said without offence to the talents of the present company."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

"Our happiness would be complete if only poor Captain Hector were with us," said Isabella, with a sigh.

"Why, what harm has come to him?" asked Bellombre, who had heard of the Swashbuckler's fame.

The Tyrant told the tragical tale of the freezing to death of the Captain.

"And but for our having fortunately come across a good old friend," added Blazius, "we should have shared his fate to-night, and have been found frozen stiff like sailors in Cimmerian darkness and cold."

"That would have been a great pity," answered Bellombre, with a meaning look at Isabella and Serafina, "but I am sure these young goddesses would have made the snow melt and nature thaw by the mere fire of their eyes."

"You attribute more power to our glances than they possess," replied Serafina. "They could not have warmed a heart even, in that dreadful, icy-cold obscurity. The tears of frost would have put out the fires of love."

WHICH JUSTIFIES

In the course of the meal Blazius informed Bellombre of the condition in which the company found itself, but this did not appear to surprise the ex-actor.

“The fortune of the stage is more capricious than the fortune of the world even,” said he. “Its wheel revolves so rapidly that it finds difficulty in balancing itself for more than a moment. But if it falls off frequently, it springs up again skilfully and lightly, and quickly recovers its equilibrium. In the morning I shall send my plough-horses to fetch your waggon here, and we shall build a stage in the barn. There is a large village not far from us which will provide a very good audience. Then, if the performance proves insufficiently remunerative, there are still in my old leather purse a few pistoles of better metal than stage coins, and by Apollo! I shall not leave my old friend Blazius and his comrades in the lurch.”

“I see,” returned the Pedant, “that you are the same generous Bellombre as ever, and that you have not grown rusty in your rustic and bucolic occupations.”

“No, indeed,” said Bellombre, “for while I cultivate my land I do not allow my brain to lie fallow. I read over the old authors by the fireplace, my feet on the andirons, and I glance through such of the plays of the present-day wits as I can obtain in this land of exile. By way of passing the time I study the parts that would be suited to me, and I have come to the conclusion that I was only a very conceited fellow in the days when I was applauded for my sonorous voice, my gallant mien, and my well shaped limbs. At that time I had no real knowledge of the art, and I slammed along like a crow cutting down walnuts. My success was due to lack of intelligence on the part of the public."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

"No one but the great Bellombre could venture to say such a thing," put in the Tyrant courteously.

"Art is long and life is short," went on the ex-actor; "and that is especially true of the player who has to render his conception of a part with the help of his personality. I was just acquiring talent, but I was also getting stout, which makes a sentimental and tragedy hero look ridiculous. I made up my mind not to wait for the day when a couple of supernumeraries would have to help me to rise when my part required that I should throw myself on my knees before the princess in order to confess my passion with asthmatic gasps and tearful, rolling eyes. I took advantage of the legacy left me, and withdrew from the stage at the height of my fame, resolved not to imitate those obstinate actors who are finally driven from the boards by abundant supplies of apple-cores, orange-skins, and hard-boiled eggs."

WHICH JUSTIFIES

"You did right, Bellombre," said Blazius, "although you did retire prematurely, for you might well have remained on the stage ten years longer."

Indeed, Bellombre, though tanned by the country air, had retained his handsome mien. His eyes, accustomed to express passion, became animated and flashed as he talked; his nostrils swelled broad and well cut; his lips, as they parted, showed teeth of which a coquette might have been proud; his dimpled chin was firmly rounded, and abundant hair, streaked with a very few silver threads, fell in rich curls upon his shoulders. He was still a remarkably handsome man.

Blazius and the Tyrant went on drinking in company with him; the ladies withdrew to a room in which the servants had lighted a blazing fire. Sigognac, Leander, and Scappino stretched themselves out in a corner of the stable on fresh straw litter, thoroughly protected from the cold by the warm breath of the animals and the wool of the horse-blankets.

While some of my characters are drinking and the others are sleeping, let us return to the waggon and see what befell there.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The dead horse still lay between the shafts ; only, its legs had stiffened like wooden posts, and its head lay flat on the ground upon the hair of its mane, the perspiration on which had frozen into ice crystals in the cold night wind. The glassy eyes were sinking deeper within the sockets, and the thin cheeks seemed to have been dissected.

Day was beginning to break ; the winter sun showed half its leaden-white disk between two long banks of clouds, and shed its pale light upon the sad landscape, on which the skeletons of trees stood out black and dismal. Over the white snow hopped ravens, guided by their sense of scent, and prudently drawing nearer the dead animal, mistrusting a trap, a snare, or a danger, for the dark, motionless mass of the waggon frightened them ; and they remarked to each other with loud caws that the concern very probably concealed a sportsman in ambush and that a raven looks uncommonly ill in a stew-pan. They hopped on with feverish desire, and then retreated in terror, performing a queer sort of pavan. One, bolder than the rest, broke away from the flock, flapped its heavy wings twice or thrice, rose from the ground, and settled upon the horse's head. It was already bending forward to pick out the eyes, when it suddenly stopped, bristled up its feathers, and seemed to listen.

WHICH JUSTIFIES

Far down the road a heavy step was crunching the snow, and though a human ear might not have noted it, it sounded clear to the raven's keen hearing. The peril was not pressing, and the sombre bird did not leave its position, but it remained watchful. The steps drew near and presently the dim shape of a man carrying a burden loomed up through the morning mists. The raven considered it wise to withdraw, and flew off with a loud caw of warning to its companions in danger.

The whole flock whirled away to the neighbouring trees with harsh, discordant cries. The man had got up to the waggon, and, surprised at coming upon an ownerless vehicle in the middle of the road, with a horse whose main drawback, like Roland's mare, was that it was dead, he stopped short, and cast a suspicious, circumspect glance around him.

Then, in order to examine matters more easily, he laid down his burden, which stood up and began to walk; for it was a little girl some twelve years of age, who, when wrapped up in the long cloak that covered her from head to foot, and hoisted upon her companion's shoulder, might readily have been mistaken for a valise or a travelling-bag. A pair of black, fiery eyes flashed sombre under the fold of the stuff in which she was clothed, eyes that were identically like Chiquita's; a string of pearls made luminous points in the tawny shadows on her neck, and round her bare legs were twisted rope-shaped rags that contrasted with this piece of luxury.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

It was none other than Chiquita herself, and her companion was Agostino, the bandit with the mannikins, who, weary of plying his trade upon untravelled roads, was bound for Paris, where every talent can find occupation, walking by night and hiding by day, as is the habit of all carnivorous and predatory beasts of prey. The child, worn out by fatigue and stiff with cold, had been unable to keep up, in spite of her courage, and Agostino, in search of a shelter, was carrying her as Homer and Belisarius were wont to carry their guides, save that Agostino was not blind, but, on the contrary, possessed eyes as sharp as the lynx, which, as the elder Pliny affirms, is able to see through a stone wall.

“What is the meaning of this?” said Agostino to Chiquita. “As a rule it is we who stop carriages, but this time it is the carriage that holds us up. We had better look out that it is not full of travellers who will call on us to stand and deliver.”

WHICH JUSTIFIES

“There is no one in it,” said Chiquita, who had peeped in under the canvas top.

“There may be something, then,” went on the bandit. “Let us search.”

Thereupon, for the daylight did not yet illumine the interior of the waggon, drawing flint, steel, and tinder from the folds of his belt, he struck a light in the dark-lantern he was accustomed to carry on his nocturnal explorations. Chiquita, forgetting her fatigue in the hope of booty, slipped into the vehicle and directed the rays of the lantern upon the parcels it contained, but could make out only a few old stage-drops, properties, and rags of no value.

“Look carefully everywhere, my dear Chiquita,” said the highwayman while keeping a bright look-out. “Rummage in the pouches and bags hanging on the sides.”

“There is nothing, absolutely nothing worth taking. Stay ! here is a bag that chinks as if it contained money.”

“Hand it out quick,” said Agostino, “and bring the light near while I examine our find. By the horns and hoofs of Lucifer, we have the devil's own bad luck ! I reckoned on good money, and this is nothing more than stage coin of brass and gilded lead. Well, let us make the best of a bad bargain, and rest a while under the awning, which will protect us against the cold wind. Your poor dear little feet are bleeding, and can be of no service to you on this long, rough road. Get under that canvas and sleep for an hour or two. Meanwhile I shall keep watch, and if any one happens along, we can clear out in a twinkling."

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Chiquita snuggled away as comfortably as she could within the waggon, pulling the old scenery over herself for the sake of warmth, and soon fell sound asleep. Agostino remained in front, his open navaja by his side and within reach, examining the country with the keen eye of the prowler who allows nothing to escape his glance. The silence was profound and the land deserted. On the distant hills patches of snow gleamed in the pale light of early morn, looking like white phantoms or marble monuments in a graveyard. But everything was reassuringly quiet. Agostino, in spite of his strong will and his iron constitution, felt sleep overcoming him. More than once his eyelids had closed and he had re-opened them with quick resolution. But objects were beginning to look hazy to him and the sense of things to vanish, when, through the incoherent, half-dreamy state into which he had sunk, he seemed to feel a warm, moist breath on his face. He woke up and his eyes opened upon the glare of two burning orbs.

WHICH JUSTIFIES

“Wolves do not eat one another, my lad,” murmured the highwayman, “and your teeth are not strong enough to tear me.”

Then, quicker than thought, he clutched the brute’s throat with his left hand, while, picking up his knife with the right, he plunged it up to the hilt in the animal’s heart. Nevertheless, though he had come off a victor, Agostino did not think the waggon a place good enough to stay in, and he awoke Chiquita, who exhibited no fear whatever at the sight of the wolf stretched out dead in the road.

“We had better make off,” said the bandit. “That dead horse is attracting the wolves, which are mad with hunger in this snowy weather when they can find nothing to eat. Of course I could kill a number of them just as I have killed this one, but they might turn up in scores, and if I happened to fall asleep I should greatly dislike awaking inside the stomach of a carnivorous animal. Then, once they had finished me, they would make but one mouthful of you, my little one, for your bones are still soft. Therefore, let us make tracks. That dead brute will delay them. You can manage to walk now, can you ? ”

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“Yes,” returned Chiquita, who was no spoiled child brought up in cotton wool, “the short sleep I have had has restored my strength ; so, dear Agostino, you will not have to carry me like a troublesome bundle. Besides,” she added with fierce energy, “when I can no longer walk, just cut my throat with your big knife and chuck me into a ditch. I shall consider it a favour.”

The highwayman and the little girl walked away with rapid steps and were soon lost in the mist. Reassured by their departure, the ravens came down from the trees, swooped down upon the dead horse, and began their horrid feast. Ere long two or three wolves turned up to take their share of the free meal, quite undisturbed by the flapping wings, the croaks, and the beak-thrusts of their black fellow-guests. Birds and quadrupeds alike wrought so heartily that in the course of a few hours the horse, picked clean, showed in the morning light like a skeleton prepared by veterinary surgeons ; there was nothing left of it but the tail and the hoofs.

WHICH JUSTIFIES

As soon as it was broad daylight, the Tyrant came along with a farm hand to fetch the waggon. He stumbled upon the half-eaten carcass of the wolf, and between the shafts, still clothed with the harness that had been left untouched by beak and tooth alike, beheld the bones of the poor horse. The contents of the bag of stage coin had been scattered upon the road, and in the snow were plainly imprinted tracks both large and small that led to the waggon and then away from it.

“It looks as if the car of Thespis had been visited by various callers during the night,” said the Tyrant. “Lucky was the accident that compelled us to interrupt our comic odyssey. I really cannot be sufficiently thankful for it. Thanks to it, we have escaped the two-legged and the four-legged wolves, all of them dangerous, the latter perhaps more so. What a treat for them would have been the tender flesh of the dear little pullets Serafina and Isabella, to say nothing of my own tough meat.”

While the Tyrant was thus soliloquising to himself, Bellombre’s servant had cast the waggon loose and was harnessing to it the horse he had brought along, though the animal snorted with terror at the terrifying sight of the skeleton and at the evil scent of the wolf whose blood stained the snow.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The waggon was put under a shed in the farm-yard; nothing had been removed from it, and indeed something had been left in it, — a small knife, one of those manufactured at Albacete, which had fallen from Chiquita's pocket while she was asleep, and which bore upon its sharp-pointed blade the threatening Spanish motto, —

“ Cuando esta vivora pica,
No hay remedio en la botica.”

This mysterious find greatly puzzled the Tyrant and rendered Isabella thoughtful, for she was somewhat superstitious and apt to draw omens, favourable or the reverse, from trifling incidents that others either did not notice or laid no stress upon. Like all fairly educated persons at that time, the young lady spoke Spanish, and the alarming meaning of the inscription did not escape her.

Scappino had started for the village, dressed in his handsome red and white striped costume, his great ruff, duly pleated and starched, his toque pulled down over his brows, his cloak on his shoulder, and with the air of a proud conqueror. As he walked, his drum bumped against his thigh with an automatic, rhythmic motion that smacked of the trooper; and indeed Scappino had followed the wars before he had taken to the stage. When he reached the church square, already escorted by a number of boys attracted by his curious dress, he pressed down his toque more firmly, took his stand, and striking his drum with the sticks, performed a roll so sharp, so masterly, and so imperative that it would have wakened the dead as surely as the last trump. The effect on the living may therefore easily be guessed; every door and window flew open as if moved by one and the selfsame spring, and from one and all issued kerchiefed heads that cast comically bewildered glances on the square. A second roll of the drum, crackling like a rattling fire of musketry and booming like the thunder, emptied the houses, wherein were left only the sick, the bedridden, and the women abed with child. In a few minutes the inhabitants of the village had formed a great circle around Scappino. Then, in order to completely fascinate his audience, the sly fellow performed upon his drum a number of long and short rolls alternately, so rapidly, so accurately, and so skilfully that the sticks became invisible, although he did not appear to be moving his wrists. As soon as he saw the wide-open mouths of the worthy villagers assume the form of an O, which, according to master-painters, as set forth in their works on expression, is the highest manifestation of wonderment, he broke his racket short off; then, after a brief moment of silence, he began in a shrill voice, with fantastic variations of intonation, the following grandiloquent and burlesque address:—

WHICH JUSTIFIES

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

“Unique opportunity this evening! Magnificent performance! Extraordinary representation! The illustrious comedians of the travelling company managed by my lord Herod, who have had the honour of performing before crowned heads and princes of the blood, will, on the occasion of their passage through this region, present, this evening only,—for they are awaited in Paris, to which they are called by the Court,—a surprisingly entertaining and altogether comical play, entitled ‘The Rodomontades of Captain Fracasse,’ with new dresses, entirely new by-play, and set bastinadoes unequalled as mirth provokers. At the close of the performance Mademoiselle Serafina will dance the Moresco, with the addition of passepieds, swings, and gambadoes in the very latest style, while accompanying herself on the tambourine, on which she performs more skilfully than any Spanish gipsy. This will prove most delightful as a spectacle. The performance will take place in Master Bellombre's barn, specially arranged for the purpose and abundantly furnished with seats and lights. As the company seeks fame rather than profit, victuals and other provisions will be accepted in lieu of cash from those who are not provided with coin. Pass the word to that effect."

WHICH JUSTIFIES

His speech finished, Scappino beat his drum so madly by way of peroration that the glass in the church windows rattled in its lead setting, and a number of dogs bolted away, more terrified than if they had had brass saucepans fastened to their tails.

Meanwhile, up at the farm, the players, assisted by Bellombre and his servants, were already at work. At the end of the barn a stage, consisting of boards laid upon empty barrels, was erected. Three or four benches borrowed from the tavern served as settles, but, considering the price of admission, it was not to be expected that they should be stuffed with hair and upholstered in velvet. The spiders had already undertaken to decorate the ceiling and had spun great cobwebs from rafter to rafter. No decorator, even one in employ of the Court could have produced more tenuous, more delicate, and more aerially elaborate hangings, even had he used China satins. The pendent webs resembled the blazoned banners that may be seen in the chapter-houses of royal and knightly orders, and formed a most noble sight for any man capable of appreciating, in imagination, this analogy.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

The cattle, whose litter had been carefully swept back, were much disturbed by the unusual upheaval, and often turned their heads away from their mangers to cast long looks at the stage, on which the players were rehearsing in order to practise Sigognac in his entrances and exits.

“My first appearance on the stage,” said the Baron, laughing, “is before an audience of calves and horned cattle. It might well wound my self-love, if I had any.”

“Nor will this be the last time you will play before such an assembly,” returned Bellombre; “for in every audience you will have fools and husbands.”

For a novice Sigognac did not play at all badly, and it was evident that he would speedily get the hang of his work. He had a good voice, an accurate memory, and a mind sufficiently cultured to enable him to add to his part those repartees that spring from fortuitous circumstances and which add so much to the vivacity of a performance. The pantomimic portion of his part troubled him far more, on account of its being plentifully sprinkled with whackings, against which his pride revolted, even though the blows were administered with sticks formed of painted canvas stuffed with sawdust. His comrades, aware of his rank, spared him as much as they could, but he became wrathful in spite of himself, and made the most terrific grimaces, frowned most formidably, and cast furious glances around. Then, quickly remembering the nature of his part, he resumed his frightened, bewildered, and suddenly cowardly mien.

WHICH JUSTIFIES

Bellombre, who was watching him with the clear-sightedness of an old actor, an expert past master of his art, called to him from where he was sitting : —

“Take care not to repress any of those natural movements of yours ; they are excellent and will produce a new variety of the Hector type. Even when you cease to feel that sudden anger and that burning indignation, you must feign to do so. Fracasse, the character you have to create, — for an imitator never rises above a subordinate rank, — would give anything to be a brave man ; he admires courage and valiant men, and is mad with himself for being a coward.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

When no danger is near, he dreams only of heroic exploits and superhuman and gigantic enterprises ; but in the presence of peril, his too lively imagination brings vividly before him the smart of wounds, the hideous face of death, and his heart fails him. He revolts at first at the thought of being thrashed, rage swells his proud stomach ; but the very first blow dispels all his resolution. That is a better plan than making your legs tremble, opening your eyes wide, and indulging in other grimaces fitter for monkeys than men, with which inferior actors strive to make the public laugh while themselves straying far from the paths of art."

Sigognac took Bellombre's advice and played in conformity with his instructions ; so well indeed that he was applauded by his comrades, who predicted that he would win success.

The performance was to take place at four in the afternoon. At three, Sigognac put on the Hector costume, which dame Leonardo had made easier by letting out the tucks which the increasing leanness of the deceased owner had rendered necessary. As he slipped it on, the Baron thought it would have been pleasanter to be putting on the buff jerkin and the steel corselet of his ancestors than to be rigging himself out as a player in order to perform the part of sham hero; the more so that he was really a brave man, capable of high deeds and heroic exploits. But adverse fortune had reduced him to this unpleasant condition and he had no other means of livelihood.

WHICH JUSTIFIES

The country people were already pouring into and crowding the barn. A few lanterns hanging from the roof rafters cast a reddish light upon the mass of dark, fair, and gray hair, amid which showed the white caps of a few women. Other lanterns had been placed as footlights along the front of the stage, for it was necessary to be careful not to set fire to the hay and straw in the place.

The play began and was followed attentively. Behind the actors, for the back of the stage was not lighted up, the great shadows cast by them seemed to be playing a parody of the piece, and to counterfeit the movements of each and all with queer jerking motions. This grotesque detail, however, remained unnoticed by the simple-minded spectators, who were absorbed by the plot and the performance of the actors, every one of whom they believed to be really the character he or she represented.

A few of the cows, unable to sleep on account of the noise, gazed upon the scene with those great eyes of theirs from which Homer, the Greek poet, drew a comparison in praise of Juno's own, and even a calf, at a most interesting point, uttered a lamentable moan that in no wise impaired the robust illusion of the worthy spectators, but nearly caused the players to burst out laughing on the stage.

CAPTAIN FRACASSE

Captain Fracasse was repeatedly applauded, for he played his part capitally, free as he was, in presence of that humble public, from the emotion he would have felt had he had to do with more cultured spectators who would have been harder to please. Then he felt quite sure that not one of these people knew who he was. The other performers were vigorously applauded when they made their hits, by the horny-handed sons of toil, who spared not themselves, and who, in Bel-lombre's opinion, gave proof of much discernment.

Serafina danced her Moresco with haughty voluptuousness, bending and posing in most alluring fashion, with springs light and graceful, rapid changes of foot, and charms of all kinds that would have delighted even people of quality and courtiers. She was particularly fascinating when, holding her tambourine above her head, she rattled the brass disks, and again when, thumbing its dark skin, she drew from it a low rumbling sound as cleverly as any professional panderera.

WHICH JUSTIFIES

Meanwhile on the walls of the ruinous manor-house of Sigognac, the dusty ancestral portraits assumed a grimmer and sulkier expression than ever before. The warriors shook their heads in most melancholy fashion, and uttered sighs that made their steel cuirasses heave. The dowagers pouted disdainfully above their pleated ruffs, and drew themselves up stiffly in their whale-boned bodices and farthingales. A low, slow, toneless whisper, the ghost of a whisper, issued from their painted lips, murmuring, "Alas! the last of the Sigognacs has derogated!"

And in the kitchen, seated sadly between Beelzebub and Miraut, who looked long and questioningly into his face, Peter was thinking, and saying to himself, "Where is my poor master at this hour?" And a tear, licked away by the old hound's tongue, rolled down the tanned cheek of the old servitor.

